In this connection I ask attention to the suggestions of the Chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery relative to naval pensions. The act of Congress approved July 11, 1862, regulating pensions, makes no provision for the new grades of the Navy—rear admiral, commodore, lieutenant commander, &c.—authorized by act of Congress on the 16th of July of the same year. The act should be so revised as to include these grades, and it is suggested that a better adaptation of the amount of pension to the responsibility of the officer might be advantageously made. The highest pay now authorized is thirty dollars per month, the family of a captain receiving no more than the family of a master commanding, and is a reduction of twenty dollars per month from the amount formerly paid. The act of Congress approved on the 4th of July last provides that a person in the "military service" who shall lose both feet shall receive a pension of twenty dollars per month, and those who shall lose both hands twenty-five dollars per month. As the law is construed not to include persons in the naval service, those who have suffered a similar loss in the Navy continue to receive but eight or ten dollars per month—an inequality which it is believed was not intended. I suggest such changes in the law as will place the sailor upon the same footing as the soldier.

PRIZE LAW.

The seventh section of the act in relation to abandoned and captured property, approved July 2, 1864, reverses the law of prize as it stood prior to the present rebellion, and also as adjudged and applied since the commencement of the rebellion by the courts in their exercise of prize jurisdiction. It reverses also for the future the public policy of the country upon the subject, as manifested in the legislation of Congress both before the rebellion and since its commencement up to the date of this act.

This abrupt reversal of settled law and of public policy in regard to "property seized or taken upon any inland waters of the United States by the naval forces thereof," was not, I apprehend, well considered, and does not appear to have undergone discussion in either branch of Congress. Whether the words "no property seized or taken upon any inland waters of the United States by the naval forces thereof" comprehend not only cargoes, but vessels, may be questioned; but it can hardly be supposed that Congress intended to deny that naval vessels captured in naval conflict, as at New Orleans, or Memphis, or in Mobile bay, are the legitimate subject of prize. The same is true also of transports, armed or unarmed, conveying the troops or munitions of an enemy, which may be captured. It seems improbable that to deprive such captures of the character of prize could have been deliberately intended.

Do the words "any inland waters of the United States" embrace the Chesapeake and Delaware bays, the bay of Mobile, and Lake Pontchartrain?

By the terms of this section the naval officer seizing or taking property has the option either to send it in to the courts or to turn it over under the act of March 12, 1863, to the Treasury agent. No one but the naval seizer has this option. All other persons must turn over their seizures to the Treasury agent. It is difficult to perceive the purpose for which this distinction is made. The property seized is either liable to capture and condemnation as prize, or it is not. If it be so liable, he is bound to send it to the prize court. Why, then, should we have authority to turn it over to the Treasury agent? and if it be not so liable, why should the naval seizer alone be relieved from the obligation of sending it to the Treasury agent?

If it be the object of the section to take away the character of prize of war from all property which may be captured by naval forces on the inland waters of the United States, it is respectfully submitted whether its repeal is not demanded by the highest considerations of public policy. The inland waters of the United States constitute cruising stations of vast extent, and so situated as to be of supreme importance in the prosecution of this, or, indeed, of any maritime war. These waters offer the readiest naval access to vast amounts of commercial property belonging to those who are now waging war against the Government. The property, both public and private, found upon these waters and along their shores belonging to the enemy is, under the public law of war, liable to capture by naval belligerents, and when so captured, to condemnation as prize of war. By the exercise of this right, a naval force can reach and capture property which should be taken from an enemy, and which is yet left untouched by our statutes.

Upon the inland waters within the insurrectionary region, or affording access to or egress from it, our naval vessels are now in great numbers, and while the war lasts will continue to be engaged in belligerent operations. Why should the law intervene and deprive that part of the Navy of one of its primary belligerent rights? It certainly could not have been intended to cripple the power of the Navy to cripple the enemy, or by law to hedge round and protect from capture and condemnation an enemy's property. The service on inland waters is not less difficult, perilous, and harassing than that on the sea, that there should be this discrimination against it, nor has it been less useful to the country.

Under the operation of this act no more of the proceeds of any capture go into the Treasury than under the law of war, because the sixth section authorizes the allowance of a moiety to "informers, collectors of the customs, and other persons," as an incentive to "vigilance in protecting the public interest." In taking this moiety from the officers and crews who make the captures, and conferring it on the informer or custom-house officer, the Treasury and country are not benefited. The right to make capture or prize of war, in all places and upon all property, subject to the law of war, is one of the encouragements which maritime nations have extended to their navies in all time, and ours has been no exception until this enactment. The exercise of this right, in cutting off the resources of an enemy, is one of the chief methods by which nations seek to bring war to a close.

There is no reason why in this war against the rebellion an ancient and rightful proceeding should be abandoned, and a rule adopted that must operate to our national injury in all wars. I can see no reason upon which to conclude that in fighting down this rebellion we should reverse all previous usage and law, either as against the rebels themselves, or their abettors, or the property upon which they rely for their resources, or why, indeed, we should relinquish any one belligerent right. On the contrary, it will be well to preserve to our Navy upon all the waters where it can float or fight all its rights of war unimpaired.

With these views the expediency of a repeal of the seventh section of the act alluded to is recommended, and the substitution in its place of some provision of like effect to that which is found in the last section of the act upon the same subject approved March 12, 1863.

CONTRACTS.

The present contract system is open to many and serious objections. Whatever may have been its merits when originally established, the condition of the country and of trade has so changed as to render essential modifications necessary, if not the abrogation of the system itself. The instability of prices, and a rising market during the progress of the war, have made it difficult, and, in some instances, almost impossible to procure offers for contracts to furnish yearly supplies for the Navy from honest and reliable contractors at a rate which does not contemplate the highest market price of gold, as well as long delay in the time of payment. Any change for the better in the condition of the country or the market will be a gain to the contractor who has an annual contract, and a corresponding loss to the Government.

A proposal made the present year for the annual supply of flax canvas, which is mostly imported, illustrates this point. The bids were received when exchange was at nearly the highest rate it has attained, and from an honorable and reliable contractor who has for years supplied the Government faithfully. The aggregate of the offer was, for payment in currency, $1,428,719 50, or for payment in gold, or its equivalent, at the time each bill was paid, $536,923. There was no alternative under the law other than to accept the currency bid, and as the rate of exchange has fallen, there has been a corresponding increase of profits to the contractor.

In this case, and others of like character, the true interest of the Government would undoubtedly be promoted, were the Department permitted to assume the risk, and omit making annual contracts, relying upon purchases as wanted, under the direction of the Department, at the current market price. The Government is seldom benefited by a rise in prices; for while the laws compel its agents to pursue a definite course of action, the contractor generally finds little difficulty in evading penalties, and a losing contract is therefore abandoned. It is worthy of serious consideration whether, for the present at least, it would not be for the true interest of the Government to relinquish the system of annual contracts altogether, and authorize purchases to be made by agents of probity, whose fidelity and integrity have been tested through years of faithful service, and who have a life-long commission as well as a character to lose as a penalty for malfeasance.

Report of the Secretary of the Navy.

Another source of embarrassment in procuring naval supplies has been the delay and uncertainty of payment. Unless a definite time for payment is fixed, and bills are promptly met, or unless interest be allowed during the delay of payment, the Government will inevitably become a large sufferer. Many of the best merchants in our principal cities, who have heretofore sought dealings with the Government, now decline accepting an order on any terms.

It has never been the policy of this Department to advance money to its agents, and they cannot for this reason make cash payments. Requisitions are drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury only for matured bills, and every day's delay in the payment of a fulfilled contract is a wrong and a loss to the holder, and of ultimate serious injury to the Government. As a consequence, the Government is driven to other, and often less honest dealers, and is compelled to pay for subsequent purchases higher rates. Government, instead of being shunned and distrusted for neglecting to make prompt payment for value received, should, for its prompt payments, be a favored purchaser in any market—enabled to deal with the manufacturer or producer at first prices instead of with second and third hands.

If supplies are procured when wanted and as wanted, at the market price, either in open purchase, by an honest agent, or upon bids received for immediate delivery, with prompt payment, immense sums would be saved to the Department and the Government.

I have heretofore referred to the defects and abuses practiced under the existing laws of awarding annual contracts for naval supplies to the lowest bidder. Whatever may be the character or reputation of the bidder for fair and honest dealing, no discretion is given to any officer of the Government in the premises, nor can any officer decline the contract, though it may be obvious the bidder cannot furnish good articles at the prices which he proposes.

Contracts are made under the operation of existing laws which cannot be honestly fulfilled; and under the practice that has prevailed the whole system has become tainted with demoralization and fraud, by which the honest and fair dealer is too often driven from the market. Articles inferior in quality and deficient in quantity are delivered and passed. Bribery and other improper practices are resorted to, to induce persons in the employment of the Government to aid in these frauds.

Malfeasance on the part of officials in connection with the purchase and delivery of supplies was alleged to exist, and with the purpose of investigating and bringing such fraudulent practices to light application was made to the War Department, which detailed an officer to prosecute these inquiries. The result is that many and great frauds have been discovered. Proceedings have accordingly been instituted, and are now in progress against some of the parties implicated before military tribunals under the statute, and against others in the civil courts.

INCREASE OF SALARIES.

In consequence of the greatly increased prices that prevail, many who are in the clerical employment of the Government, at a compensation established prior to the war, are receiving a remuneration wholly insufficient. The state of the currency, with other causes, has so affected prices that these men are receiving relatively but about one half the pay of former years, and the effect has been such as to compel many of the best clerks in this Department to leave the Government service. This is a public injury, especially in a crisis like the present. The place of an experienced and accomplished clerk is at no time easily supplied; but when such place is vacated for the reason that it is not remunerative, or that the pay is below corresponding situations in private establishments, the difficulty is increased. It is therefore suggested that the salaries of the clerical force, or a portion of the clerical force, be increased until the close of the war, or until the currency shall return to a specie standard.

This recommendation is made with some reluctance, and only under a sense of its absolute necessity at this time.

MASTER'S MATES.

When the rate of pay for master's mates was established it was thought to correspond with that of other grades, but the changes in currency and values which have since taken place render it difficult to retain in service a sufficient number of this highly serviceable and meritorious class of officers. I would therefore recommend that the pay of master's mates be increased from forty to sixty dollars per month.

EXPENSES AND ESTIMATES.

On the 1st day of July, 1863, there was an unexpended balance standing to the credit of the Department of.....$39,101,970 34
The appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, were..... 76,663,567 36

Total available means.....$115,765,537 70
The expenditures of the Department during the same time were..... 85,733,292 77

Leaving a balance at the commencement of the present fiscal year of.....$30,032,244 93
The appropriations for the current year are 109,256,714 54

Making the total available resources for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865.....$139,289,059 47

The estimates submitted for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, are as follows:

Pay of the Navy.....	$23,327,722 50
Construction and repair of steam machinery.....	17,145,000 00
Construction and repair of vessels.....	21,530,000 00
Ordnance and magazines.....	9,187,615 00
Fuel, hemp, and equipment of vessels.....	14,050,000 00
Provisions and clothing.....	13,923,280 75
Navy yards and superintendents.....	4,577,313 00
Navigation and Naval Academy.....	562,626 00
Surgeons' necessaries and hospitals.....	315,000 00
Marine corps.....	1,509,087 70
Contingent and miscellaneous.....	2,970,018 33
Total.....	$112,187,663 28

The expenditures of the Department since the 4th of March, 1861, have been as follows:

From 4th of March to close of fiscal year, June 30, 1861.....	$6,245,357 63
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1862.....	42,900,529 06
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1863.....	63,211,105 27
For fiscal year ending June 30, 1864.....	85,733,292 77
From July 1, 1864, to September 1, 1864.....	41,257,976 72
Estimated expenditures from November 1, 1864, to March 4, 1865.....	42,000,000 00
Total for four years.....	$280,647,261 45

This exhibits an average annual expenditure, through four years of expensive war, prosecuted under many and great disadvantages, of $70,161,813. Could the transactions of the Department have been conducted on the true standard of value, that of gold and silver, or of paper convertible into money at the will of the holder, our naval war expenses would scarcely exceed, perhaps not equal, the current expense of either of the great maritime Powers during the same period. There is also this great difference: those Powers had a navy already constructed and in commission. We have had to create and pay for one, in addition to our annual current war expenses. Were the cost of our vessels deducted from the amount above stated, the expenses of this Department would fall millions below those of other Governments. As the vessels which were built and purchased have an intrinsic value, the money paid for them may be considered to be well invested.

The condition of the currency, which has enhanced the cost of all materials and supplies, has swelled the naval expenditures many millions, while the failure to pay promptly when due the bills of contractors and others has still further increased the aggregate of expenditures and augmented the difficulties in the work of creating and organizing the naval force.

THE BUREAUS.

The reports of the chiefs of the several bureaus present in detail the operations of their respective departments for the year. As they will be printed at the commencement of the session of Congress, it is unnecessary that I should do more than refer to the principal subjects embraced in them.

The chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks calls attention to the great increase in the cost of materials and labor, and the consequent deficiency in some of the appropriations. He urges a change in the present contract system, and gives it as his opinion that, in consequence of its operation, the bureau is compelled to pay twenty per cent. more than the market price for some of the smaller articles, which could better be procured by open purchase. The intelligence, judgment, and great experience of this officer entitle his suggestions to respectful consideration. The delay in passing the appropriation bill until near the close of the long session of Congress is considered another fruitful source of evil. The purchase of additional land at Boston and Philadelphia to enlarge the navy-yards at those places is recommended. More water front is indispensably necessary.

The report of the chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair explains in detail the kind of vessels it is proposed to build, and for which estimates are submitted. He recommends that provision be made for procuring and keeping on hand a supply of building timber and material, the accumulations of past years having been exhausted. He also recommends that measures be taken to increase the facilities in the several navy-yards for the construction of vessels. In case of a foreign war, an additional number of dry docks would be required. Many important suggestions are made relative to the size of steam war vessels and the construction of armored vessels, for sea-service.

The report of the chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering contains a review of the operations of the bureau since the commencement of the war. Detailed statements are made of the size and power of the different classes of engines designed by the bureau and by other parties, and of the results attained in each case. Particular notice is given to the experiments which have been made to test the relative value of engines and boilers; the economy of using super-heated over saturated steam, as well as steam with different measures of expansion; the value of the different kinds of coal, and of petroleum as a substitute; and of other less important combinations which enter into the construction and working of steam machinery. Drawings and specifications have been furnished for the machinery of one hundred and sixteen steamers, having an aggregate burden of 149,906 tons, besides supplying the necessary drawings and directions for the alteration and renewal, in whole or in part, of the machinery of a very large number of other vessels.

The chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting states the personnel of the Navy at about 6,000 officers and 45,000 men. Under the operation of the acts of Congress, giving seamen the same bounties as soldiers, and crediting their enlistment upon the quotas of towns, the naval deficiencies have been filled. There are now about two hundred and fifty apprentice boys on the school-ship Sabine, and the system, as well as the proficiency of the pupils, is well spoken of. The consumption of coal this year will be about five hundred thousand tons. The ropewalk at the Charlestown navy-yard furnishes all the larger sizes of rope required, but the facilities at the Washington navy-yard are entirely inadequate to supply the needed quantity of cables and anchors, and additional establishments are recommended.

The report of the chief of the Bureau of Ordnance presents a résumé of the history and economy of our naval ordnance. The constant demands of the Navy during the year for ordnance and ordnance stores have been promptly met, and at the same time full attention has been given to the many new and important ordnance questions of the day. Among other suggestions, is that of the removal of our large magazines from their present locations to more secluded situations. The importance of the permanent organization of a gunnery-ship, as a school for the instruction of officers and men preparatory to being placed on board cruising vessels is again presented. Owing to the great increase of ordnance work and the accumulation of material at the New York navy-yard more room is needed. To meet this requirement, the bureau has commenced the filling up of the unoccupied marsh adjacent to the cob-dock, which, when completed, will afford ample accommodations as well as furnish a park for two thousand cannon, with all appliances for fitting them for service.

Report of the Postmaster General.

The chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing recommends a new arrangement of store-houses, and that they be entirely disconnected from the navy-yards. Also the establishment of two Government bakeries, and the preparation by the Government of the preserved meats and desiccated vegetables which now form a part of the Navy ration. He also recommends an increase in the number of paymasters and assistant paymasters in the regular service, and the establishment of the grade of passed assistant paymaster. The extraordinary rise in the price of provisions and clothing, and the increased number of men in the service, render additional appropriations necessary.

The chief of the Bureau of Navigation submits the usual reports of the Naval Observatory, Nautical Almanac office, and the general administration of his department. Nearly all the nautical instruments used in the Navy, which, prior to the war, were procured abroad, are now of American manufacture, not excepting chronometers and comparing watches. The same gratifying advance cannot be stated with reference to material for flags, as we still sail under foreign bunting. Notwithstanding the large quantity used by the Army, the Navy, and the commercial marine, scarcely any progress has been had in inducing American establishments to undertake its manufacture.

The chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery states the number of casualties reported during the year to be 171 killed and 351 wounded. Total number of cases of sickness under treatment, 61,229; of which number 1,048 died, 58,070 were returned to duty or discharged, leaving 2,111 under treatment at the close of the year. The total number of deaths is 1,560. He suggests a reorganization of the medical department so as to place it in better harmony with the growth and expansion of other branches of the service, and to adapt it more efficiently to present wants. With the existing organization and pay, it is found impossible to procure the requisite number of medical officers, the superior inducements held out to enter the land service attracting many in that direction who would otherwise prefer service in the Navy. The statistics forming a part of the report show the large number of resignations, as well as the large proportion of those now in the volunteer service who decline positions in the permanent corps. Since January, fifty-two resignations have occurred, and quite a number are now before the Department unaccepted, simply because of the impossibility of filling the vacancies. It is suggested that the only remedy is to make the medical commission more desirable in pay and position. The subject is commended to the attention of Congress. Additional appropriations are required for the completion of hospitals, and an alteration of the law of March 3, 1851, relating to the value of rations of sick transferred to hospitals, is suggested. Authority to purchase the balance of square No. 948, in the city of Washington, for a naval hospital, is also requested. The Government already owning a portion of the land makes it desirable, on many accounts, that the remainder (some fourteen thousand feet) should also be under control of the Department.

The colonel commandant of the Marine corps reports his command in a good state of discipline. Although its number is now fully equal to the quota authorized by law, he is unable to comply with all the requisitions for guards for sea-going vessels. The reports from the several squadrons and vessels of the service show that, in the gallant deeds of the Navy, the marines have borne an honorable part.

CONCLUSION.

In this, my fourth annual report, I have submitted somewhat in detail the condition of the Department and the service. This report presents the distribution and employment of a maritime force which, including the additions to it now in progress and near completion, constitutes, for all the purposes of defense, if not of attack and conquest, the most powerful national navy in the world. In four preceding similar communications, including that submitted to you upon the assembling of Congress in the extra session of 1861, it has been my duty to exhibit the methods and measures of administration, by which, from a comparatively small beginning, and under the pressure of an unexampled exigency, this vast naval power has, since your accession to the Presidency, been brought into existence; to state the contributions which have been made to it from our commercial marine; to indicate the application of all the resources of our public naval establishments to its construction and preparation for service; to show how individual energy and skill and capital have come successfully in aid of insufficient governmental provision for the due prosecution of the work, and to trace in general outline the processes and results of inventive genius and scientific experiment which have changed to a great extent the materials and forms of naval structure and armor and armament, and have enabled our country, while in so brief a period assuming a foremost place among maritime nations, to create also a new era in the development and application of naval force.

In connection with such account of the sudden creation of a new American naval power, it has been at the same time my privilege in these communications to make official record of a series of naval enterprises and achievements wholly without precedent or parallel. No previous conception of efficient blockade; no former endurance under the fire of fortified batteries; no audacity and success heretofore known of naval attack upon such fortresses, through formidable submarine obstructions spread for their defense; no similar penetration by war vessels of internal waters through a reach of navigation almost continental; no other gigantic scale of coöperation of naval with army forces in expeditions and combats hundreds of miles from the seaboard, and along the course of rivers precarious and dangerous of navigation, can anywhere be found of a character to compare with the triumphs in all these forms of naval effort which it has been the duty of this Department during the past three years to organize and to report.

If in the prosecution of duties so arduous, complicated, and exacting, the trust confided to this Department shall appear to have been faithfully and fitly discharged, then certainly my acknowledgments are still due, as they have been heretofore expressed, to the gentlemen associated with me in its management, to the whole clerical force, to the several chiefs of bureaus, and especially to the invaluable services of the Assistant Secretary and the chief clerk of the Department.

But it is to the officers and men of our naval service that the great renown of what has thus been done, and is doing, justly belongs. The best administration of this Department can do little more at any time than to give them the adequate means and the right opportunity of action. To them, therefore, first and always, be the honor, when their own country and the world shall recognize in this expansion and these exploits of our naval power a spectacle of patriotic and virtuous heroism worthy of the cause in which it is displayed, and of the national life which it illustrates and defends.

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

To the PRESIDENT.

Report of the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
November 2, 1864.

SIR: The postal revenues for the year ending the 30th June last were $12,438,253 78, and the expenditures of this Department during the same period were $12,444,786 20, showing an excess of the latter of $206,532 42. The accompanying table, No. 1, (see appendix,) exhibits the annual postal revenues and expenditures from 1854 to 1864, from which it will be seen that the average annual receipts of this Department from 1859 to 1861, inclusive, were $8,745,822 62, and the average annual expenditures for the same period were $14,432,008 44, showing an average annual excess of expenditures over receipts of $5,736,725 82; and the average annual receipts from 1862 to 1864, inclusive, were $10,871,530 97, and the expenditures $11,694,785 72, showing an average annual excess of expenditures over receipts of $823,254 75.

The excess of receipts in 1864 over 1861, the first year of the rebellion, was $4,088,957 38.

Although the proportion of receipts as against the expenditures has, doubtless, been increased, on account of the suspension of the postal service in the insurrectionary States, the above exhibit furnishes the evidence of an improving financial condition of the Department, highly creditable to the administration of my immediate predecessor.

The details of the financial operations of the Department during the last fiscal year are set forth in the accompanying report of the Auditor. (See No. 21 of the appendix.)

The estimate of expenditure for 1864 was fixed at $13,000,000, in which was included the sum of $1,000,000, specially appropriated for the overland mail service, being $355,213 80 more than the amount actually expended.

On the other hand, the revenues of 1864 were estimated at an increase of five per cent. on those of 1862, making $8,714,000, while they actually reached $12,438,253 78, or $3,724,253 73 more than the estimate. This increase equals 42½ per cent.

The increase of expenditures in 1864, compared with those of 1863, is 11½ per cent., and the increase in the revenues for the same year 11½ per cent.

This exhibit promises an increase of the revenues for 1865 over the estimate submitted in the report of last year.

Estimates for 1866:

The expenditures of all kinds for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866, (see table No. 2,) are estimated at..... $14,098,500 00

The gross revenue for the year 1866, including foreign postage and miscellaneous receipts, is estimated at an increase of six per cent. on the revenue of 1864, making..... 13,184,547 79

Estimated deficiency of revenue compared with estimated expenditures..... $913,952 21

From this sum must be deducted the amount of the permanent appropriations to compensate the Department for carrying free mail matter, under acts of March 3, 1847, and March 3, 1851..... 700,000 00

By which the estimated deficiency is reduced to..... $213,952 21

The grants for the transportation of free mail matter for the last two fiscal years have not been expended. Assuming that the amount of $700,000 for the last year is still available, no appropriation for any deficiency in the revenues will be required.

In making the estimate of probable expenditures for 1866, the amounts actually expended under the several heads during the past fiscal year have been taken as a basis; but an increase in several of the items named has become necessary, particularly in the appropriation for postage stamps and stamped envelopes, the estimated cost of the latter being increased $140,000 per annum, according to the terms of a new contract elsewhere referred to in this report.

The whole number of drafts and warrants issued during the year to the creditors of the Department, in payment of balances reported to be due by the Auditor, was 16,608. The warrants were drawn on the Treasurer of the United States, five Assistant Treasurers, and seven designated depositories; and the drafts on sixty-five post office depositories, and on the postmasters at three hundred and sixty-one draft offices. Of the above-named post office depositories, forty-five were established on January 1, 1864.

About 80 per cent. of the net revenue of the Department for the year, or $7,083,179 81, was concentrated in the hands of the above-named depositories and at draft offices. Of this amount $5,327,761 was disbursed during the year, leaving subject to draft on July 1, 1864, $1,755,418 81.

The remainder of the revenue was collected by means of orders issued by the Auditor on postmasters at collection offices, and through payments made by postmasters to special mail carriers and mail messengers.

During the fiscal year 334,054,610 postage stamps, of the value of $10,177,327, 26,644,300 stamped envelopes, amounting to $765,512 50, and 1,574,500 newspaper wrappers, amounting to $31,490, were issued. The total value of these issues was $10,974,329 50, which, compared with the issue of the previous year, ($10,338,760,) shows an increase of $635,569 50, or about 6 1/4 per cent. The value of the stamps and stamped envelopes sold was $10,776,589 58, and the amount used in the prepayment of postage was $9,878,155 61. The details are exhibited in tables Nos. 3 and 4 of appendix.

Notwithstanding this enormous issue, the losses of stamps in the mails amounted only to $1,206, and of envelopes to $31 80. This result may be in part attributed to the system of registering each package of stamps and envelopes mailed, and to the fact that route agents and postmasters at separating offices are also instructed to keep a record of all such packages passing through their offices. During the year 1859, (the year immediately preceding the adoption of this system of registration,) the value of postage stamps issued amounted to $5,279,405, while the losses in transmission during the last six months of that period were $4,373. Since that time the losses have decreased, although the issue has increased about 92 1/2 per cent.

The number of packages of stamps sent out during the year was 58,500, of stamped envelopes 18,688, and the claims allowed for deficiencies in the number of stamps amounted to only $29, and in the stamped envelopes 80 cents, showing great care on the part of those intrusted with this branch of the business.

Postage stamps are regularly supplied to the armies of the Potomac and Cumberland, through special agents of the Department located at or near the headquarters of each. Since the inauguration of this practice—about the 1st of July last—the agent stationed at City Point, Virginia, has sold stamps amounting to $29,773 96, and the agent of the army at Chattanooga $5,210.

Under the act for "the relief of postmasters who have been robbed by confederate forces or rebel guerrillas," one hundred and thirty-nine claims have been made, representing losses of postage stamps and money amounting in the aggregate to $5,958 97. Of the claims thus reported, sixty-two have been examined and reported on favorably, the aggregate of the credits allowed being $2,130 50. The balance of the claims—seventy-seven—representing $3,828 47, are still pending, the evidence furnished being in most cases insufficient.

Losses of a somewhat different character frequently occur, relief for which cannot be granted without additional legislation. I refer to cases where, by reason of the presence of armed forces, a post office is destroyed, and the postmaster loses the fixtures and furniture, and to cases where the loss is occasioned by our own troops. The report of my predecessor two years since recommended that such losses be provided for, and I invite attention to the subject, as several such claims have been made, where the losses have occurred through no fault of the postmaster.

During the last session of Congress a bill was passed for the relief of the contractor for furnishing the Department with stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers; under the provisions of which the existing contract expired on September 11, 1864, when a conditional contract was made, to expire December 31, 1864, at an advanced rate for stamps and envelopes.

After the award of the contract above referred to, the Department and the contractor received a protest from a party in New York claiming to be the patentee of newspaper wrappers, with notice that he should assert his rights. Under these circumstances, and in view of the enormous advance in the contract price of the article, the Department decided to discontinue the issue for the present.

Notwithstanding the advance of every article used in the manufacture of stamps, and the large increase in the number required by the Department, the National Bank Note Company, of New York, have fulfilled in a satisfactory manner all their obligations. It is due to these contractors to add that they receive for postage stamps but twelve cents per thousand, while the contractors for internal revenue stamps receive thirty-three cents per thousand.

Seven temporary clerks have been employed for several years, who are paid out of the appropriation for postage stamps and stamped envelopes, and as they constitute a portion of the necessary force of the Department, I suggest the propriety of providing for them by law.

CONTRACTS.

Table A (No. 5) exhibits the service as it stood on the 30th of June last in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, West Virginia, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Minnesota, Kentucky, California, Oregon, Kansas, and the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Dakota, and Nevada, at which time there were in operation in those States and Territories 6,083 mail routes, the number of contractors being 5,953. The length of these routes was 139,173 miles, and the service as follows, namely:

Railroad, 22,616 miles; steamboat, 7,278 miles; "celerity, certainty, and security," 109,278 miles—costing $5,818,469, divided as follows, namely: railroad, 23,301,942 miles of transportation at $2,567,044, about 11 cents a mile; steamboat, 2,112,134 at $253,274, about 12 cents a mile; "celerity, certainty, and security," 30,901,281 at $2,998,151, about 9 7-10 cents a mile.

The length of routes was decreased 425 miles, while there was an increase in the annual transportation of 89,342 miles, and in the cost of $77,893.

The aggregate compensation of route agents, local agents, mail messengers, baggage masters in charge of express mails, and agents employed on steamers conveying mails to southern ports, was $546,753 48, which, added to the cost of service in operation on 30th June, 1864, ($5,818,469,) makes the total cost of mail transportation at that date $6,365,222 48.

The contract term for the middle section, comprising the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Ohio, expired on the 30th of June last, and the new term commenced on the 1st of July following. The service under these lettings, for the first quarter of the contract, ended September 30, 1864, is exhibited by the annexed statement, namely:

	Miles.	Miles of annual transportation.	Cost.
Railroad.....	7,492	7,334,701	$932,349
Steamboat.....	392	218,088	17,735
"Celerity, certainty, and security".....	21,193	6,845,996	407,071

Other tables, showing the operations of the Contract office, are appended to this report. (See No. 5, B, C, D, E, and F.)

Notwithstanding an express provision of law, (section twenty-nine of act of July 2, 1836,) which provides "that no person whose bid for the transportation of the mail may be accepted shall receive any pay until he shall have executed his contract according to law and the regulations of the Department," but few of the railroad companies engaged in carrying mails are under contract; and the practice of recognizing their service from quarter to quarter has been necessary for a series of years, to enable the Auditor to issue orders in favor of the companies, for the collection of moneys in the hands of postmasters on the routes, and the adjustment of accounts for services rendered.

Attention has been called to this subject by my predecessors for the purpose of securing additional legislation investing the head of this Department with power to compel compliance with the law by prohibiting payments except on executed contracts. The matter is discussed by Postmaster General Holt in his report of December 3, 1859, and again alluded to December 1, 1860, and also by my immediate predecessor in his reports of December 2, 1861, and December 1, 1862; but, believing that the law is sufficiently explicit as it now stands, I do not propose further legislation, in the hope that the several railroad companies will no longer refuse to enter into the obligations assumed by all other persons contracting with the Government. Should I be disappointed in this reasonable hope, I shall not fail to call upon Congress for such legislation as the necessities of the service require.

In the last annual report attention was called to the unsettled accounts of persons employed to convey mails by sea to the military and naval forces and inhabitants at New Orleans, Pensacola, and other ports, rendered necessary by the insurrection in the southern States, and also for service performed in steamships on the North Pacific coast during the winter of 1862, when the usual land routes were interrupted by extraordinary floods. These services were necessary to provide for communication with the soldiers and sailors engaged in the defense of the country, and the people isolated by an act of Providence, and were authorized by several acts of Congress. The Auditor of the Treasury for this Department, adjudging the contracts illegal, declined acting on the accounts of contractors and orders of the Postmaster General, rendering an appeal to Congress necessary. This resulted in the legislation contained in the fifth section of the "act to provide for the conveyance of mails to foreign ports," &c., approved March 25, 1864, under which the sum of $18,050 has been paid to several parties for the sea service performed by order of the Postmaster General on the Atlantic coast and Gulf of Mexico, to the 30th of September last.

The claim made by the steamship owners for service on the North Pacific coast, during the floods of 1862 on the land, was at the rate of $8,000 per month for three months, but the amount deemed adequate by the Department was $8,642 for the whole service, and this was the sum reported to the Auditor as due the claimants; but Congress having fixed the sum to be paid for this service at $1,500, which they declined to receive, the claim is still unadjusted.

The contract for service on the route from the Missouri river, via Salt Lake, to Placerville, California, under act of March 2, 1861, expiring on the 30th of June last, an arrangement was made with the same parties for continuing the service on the same terms to September 30, 1864.

Under an advertisement dated March 22, 1864, inviting proposals for service from Atchison, Kansas, or St. Joseph, Missouri, to Folsom City, California, John H. Heistand, of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, was the lowest bidder, at $750,000 per annum; but his bid having been subsequently withdrawn, contracts have been made with Ben. Holladay, of New York, for the service between Atchison, or St. Joseph, and Salt Lake City, at $365,000, and with W. B. Dinsmore, president of the Overland Mail Company, also of New York, from Salt Lake City to Folsom City, at $385,000, making an aggregate of $750,000 per annum. These parties are believed to be able to fulfill their obligations. The contracts are from October 1, 1864, to September 30, 1868; the trips to be made in sixteen days eight months in the year, and in twenty days the remaining four months; to convey through letter mails only, mail matter prepaid at letter rates, and all local or way mails.

Paper and document mails for the Pacific coast are to be carried by sea, via New York and Panama, temporary arrangements having been made for their conveyance, within the sum named in the law of March 25, 1864, namely: $160,000 per annum; making the whole expense of territorial and Pacific mails not over $910,000 per annum, or $90,000 less than under the former contract.

Owing to Indian depredations, the overland service was much interrupted during the months of August and September last, and, for a period of four or five weeks, the whole mail for the Pacific coast and the Territories was necessarily sent by sea from New York.

The contract for the California and Oregon route—Sacramento to Portland—terminating September 16, 1864, proposals were invited for the continuance of the service to 1866 and 1868. But one bid was received, that of the California Stage Company, at $250,000 per annum, which was deemed extravagant for the service required, and accepted to June 30, 1865, only, with a view to again invite competition, which has been done.

Pursuant to the eighth section of the act of March 2, 1861, and the second section of the act of February 24, 1863, the contract for service on the route from St. Cloud, Minnesota, to Pembina, in Dakota Territory, was extended to June 30, 1865, and the trips increased from one to two per week, at an increase of compensation of $17,167 per annum. As the contracts on all other routes in the State expire June 30, 1866, this will be re-let for one year only, so that it may be embraced in the contract section to which it belongs.

Report of the Postmaster General.

The topographer of the Department having been instructed by my predecessor to prepare a set of maps, by States or groups of States, designed to show all the permanent routes, distances, and post offices thereon, in the United States, with other statistical information, I have to communicate that progress has been made in their preparation. It is found, however, that in consequence of the enhanced price of all articles purchased through the contingent fund, chargeable with the expenses, that the fund, as previously estimated, will be insufficient, having regard to other demands upon it; and I therefore recommend that an appropriation of $10,000 be made for preparing and publishing these maps. It is believed that the proceeds of the sale of such as will not be needed for the use of this Department will eventually more than reimburse the entire outlay, leaving a surplus which will diminish, to that extent, future appropriations for contingent purposes.

The number and description of mail bags and mail locks purchased during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, and the cost thereof, appear in statement No. 6, in the appendix to this report.

By resolution of Congress, approved July 1, 1864, the Postmaster General was "authorized to examine and adjust the claim of Carlisle Doble for carrying the mails between Taylor's Falls, Minnesota, and Superior, Wisconsin, from April to November, 1857, and to pay him such sum of money as shall be found to be justly and equitably due." Under the authority thus conferred the claim was examined and the sum of $3,968 46 allowed, which was reported to the Auditor for payment on the 26th September last.

On the 3d of March, 1864, the Inspection office of the Department, in its distinct and separate form, was abolished, and its duties transferred to the Contract office, in charge of the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

The net amount of fines imposed and deductions made during the year from the pay of mail contractors for failures and other delinquencies, was $44,375 55.

By the seventeenth section of an act of Congress approved July 1, 1864, chapter one hundred and ninety-seven, page 339, it is enacted "that the special agent of the Post Office Department on the Pacific coast shall receive a compensation of five dollars per diem." The salary of this officer was $2,500 per annum under the act of March 2, 1861, and for all traveling and incidental expenses no greater sum than two dollars for each day employed could be allowed under the act of March 3, 1845.

It is not supposed that Congress intended to reduce the pay of this officer from $3,230 to $1,825, but such is the effect of the law, and I therefore recommend such a modification of that section as will restore his full salary of $2,500 per annum from the date of the passage of said act, and to provide for his actual traveling expenses a sum not exceeding five dollars per diem. Although, at the time of the passage of the said act, two dollars per diem was considered sufficient for the traveling and incidental expenses of these officers, it is now inadequate, and I recommend that all other special agents be allowed a sum not exceeding four dollars per day while employed.

For several years after the occupation of the Pacific coast by the United States, the agent of this Department stationed at San Francisco had larger powers than usually confided to special agents in the Atlantic States, particularly in reference to the adjustment of contractors' accounts, the practice being for him to give certificates of service performed under mail contracts, on which the postmaster at San Francisco made payments. The accounts were then transmitted to the Auditor for entry and final settlement. In this manner payments to mail contractors were expedited; but doubts arising as to the authority of the Postmaster General to confer such powers on a subordinate officer, they were withdrawn, and the Pacific agent is now on the same footing with all other officers of his class. It is believed that the functions of this officer could be enlarged with advantage to the public service, and, as previous legislation is necessary, attention is called to the subject.

In this connection it is proper to add that, from information which has recently reached me, I am apprehensive that the postal service in the Pacific States is not in as good condition as should be desired; and I may have occasion to communicate with Congress upon the subject during its approaching session.

Inquiry has been made of Lieutenant General Grant relative to the existing arrangements for supplying our armies with mails, with the assurance of my earnest purpose to cooperate with him in carrying into effect any desired improvements of that service; and I am gratified to learn from his reply that the system of receiving and forwarding mails now in operation is entirely satisfactory; and that "our soldiers receive their mail matter with as much regularity and promptness as is possible for armies in the field, and perhaps with as much celerity and security as the most favored portions of the country." He also informs me that the policy originally adopted of excluding civilians from the mail service within the lines of the Army, and detailing for that duty enlisted men of intelligence and reliability, will be continued.

For many years the regulations of this Department have required that every post office should mail letters direct to every other office not on the route to any distributing office, and that all other letters should be mailed to the first distributing office on the route to their destination, involving considerable expense and delays in the transmission of the mails. This subject has been frequently referred to in the reports of this Department. Elaborate distribution schemes have been proposed to improve the existing system, which is still considered defective.

The majority of letters are now subjected to delays, while the expense attending the work in twenty-two distributing post offices amounted, during the fourth quarter of 1864, to nearly $200,000, being at the rate of $800,000 per year, or about sixty-two per cent. of the whole expense of clerk hire in all offices.

The mailing of all letters direct from one office to another, however situated, in so vast a territory as that embraced within the United States, is objectionable. The ordinary distributing post offices not meeting the necessities of the service, experiments have been commenced with railway or traveling post offices. The requisite cars for the purpose are prepared for one daily line between Washington and New York, and by means of clerks taken, temporarily, from the post offices at Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, letters intended for distribution at either of those points are distributed in the cars, and so arranged that they can be dispatched without delay on connecting routes. Thus it is found that the transmission of letters is expedited from twelve to twenty-four hours, being the time usually lost in distributing offices. Similar experiments have been made on the routes from Chicago, Illinois, to Clinton, Davenport, and Dubuque, Iowa, with equally satisfactory results.

Attention has been given to the putting in operation the railway distribution to other prominent points, and the companies which have been asked to furnish the necessary car facilities have generally responded favorably. On the great eastern and western routes to Cleveland, as well as between Washington and New York, the size and importance of the mails and the amount of distribution to be done are such as to require accommodations to the extent of an entire car. West of Cleveland only a portion of a car will be used on each route.

In order to make the work of railway post offices effectual, a change in the mode of mailing letters is necessary. All offices cannot mail direct, neither can all mail to a railway office. The work will, therefore, be divided between head offices and route offices, the former being those which are the initial or terminal points of routes, and the latter those offices or stations on the direct line of a road from which there are no post roads diverging. Additional clerks, as well as superintendents and traveling postmasters, will be required, for whom I recommend provision be made by law.

The introduction of the proposed scheme will necessarily be attended with difficulties, and must be accomplished gradually. The classification of offices alone will require time and labor, and for the present operations will be limited to a few principal railroad lines. Until the necessary classification is completed, and the railway distribution organized, it is anticipated that additional expenses will be involved; but it is hoped that the final effect will be to reduce the expenses connected with the present plan of distribution. Under the new law, also, which took effect 1st of July last, all accounting for paid letters has been dispensed with, thus saving much labor heretofore required in mailing letters and in keeping accounts. The transcripts of mails sent and received under the old system at five of the principal offices amounted to 50,000 folios. The accounts from the same offices for the quarter ended 30th September last, during which changes were only partially introduced, show a saving in this respect of nearly fifty per cent. Thus in various ways the ordinary expenses of post offices are expected to be diminished so as to compensate for the cost of railway distribution. But, whether this result be fully attained or not, the expedition of mails will be insured.

FOREIGN MAIL SERVICE.

The statistics of the foreign service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1864, are fully exhibited in the tables prepared by the Auditor of this Department, also in statement No. 7 annexed to this report, and show the following general results, namely:

The aggregate postage (sea, inland, and foreign) upon the correspondence exchanged with Great Britain, Prussia, France, Hamburg, Bremen, and Belgium, amounted to $1,399,605 69, being an increase of $174,930 48, as compared with the last year, and $21,458 37 in excess of the largest amount realized in any previous fiscal year. The collections in this country amounted to $881,730 68, and in Europe to $517,875 01—excess of collections in the United States $363,855 67. This result is significant and gratifying, showing a largely increased correspondence with Europe, notwithstanding the civil troubles agitating the country, and the interruption of postal communications with the southern States.

The transatlantic mail transportation was performed as follows:

By the foreign steamships of the New York and Liverpool, Canadian, Bremen, and Hamburg lines, $770,365 01.

By British contract mail packets of the Cunard and Galway lines, $629,240 68.

The amount paid by this Department for mail steamship service to and from Europe was $371,740 44—the steamships employed receiving the sea postage on the mails conveyed as compensation for the service. Of this amount the Liverpool and New York and Philadelphia Steamship Company received $202,914 34 for fifty-two outward and fifty-three inward trips between New York, Queenstown, and Liverpool; the Canadian mail packets, $77,175 30 for fifty-three round trips between Portland and Liverpool, and Quebec and Liverpool; the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, $46,149 61 for sixteen outward and fifteen inward trips, and the New York and Hamburg Steamship Company, $45,501 18 for thirteen outward and twelve inward trips, between New York and Southampton.

The total postages on the correspondence exchanged with British North American provinces during the year amounted to $307,371 39, being an increase of $81,628 09 over the amount reported last year, and of $129,618 88 over that for the previous fiscal year. The postages collected in this country amounted to $163,755 74, and in the provinces to $138,615 64—excess in favor of the United States, $30,140 10. This extraordinary increase of correspondence is probably partly owing to the fact that large numbers of rebel agents, sympathizers, and refugees have taken up their temporary abode in Canada and the other provinces.

The total postages on the mails conveyed to and from the West Indies amounted to $59,990 18, and the cost of transporting the same to and from Havana and other West India ports was $40,337 03, being $19,653 15 less than the United States post-ages on the mails conveyed. Heretofore the steamers employed in this service received as compensation the gross amount of United States postages upon the correspondence transported, without allowing for the expenses of the inland service; but as no contracts were executed with the Department, calling for the performance of a specified number of trips, according to a fixed schedule of sailing days, and as the mails they conveyed received no greater care or attention while in transit than is ordinarily given to first-class freight, it was considered by my predecessor proper that the compensation for the sea portion of the service should be so adjusted as to prevent loss to the postal revenues; and arrangements were accordingly concluded by him with the proprietors of all the steamship lines, except two, plying between New York and Havana, for a fixed compensation by the trip of $125 each way, or $250 per round trip, if not exceeding the United States postages on the mails conveyed. The proprietors of two of the steamship lines in question declined to accede to this rate of compensation, claiming that they were entitled to the gross amount of postages under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of June 15, 1860, which authorizes the Postmaster General to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports, by steamships, allowing therefor the sea and inland postage if by an American vessel, and the sea postage only if by a foreign vessel. The provisions of this section have not been construed by this Department as requiring the Postmaster General to allow the sea and inland postages on the mails conveyed, to all American vessels, but simply as limiting the compensation in any case to that amount.

The payment of $250 per round trip, limited to the postages, having been generally accepted by the proprietors as ample remuneration for the steamship service between New York and Havana, no reason occurs to me why it should not be adopted as the uniform compensation for all the steamships employed on that route.

As doubts have arisen relative to the proper construction of the fourth and fifth sections of the act of the 14th of June, 1858, and the fourth section of the act of the 15th of June, 1860, which, in effect, superseded the last-mentioned section, I recommend additional legislation authorizing the Postmaster General to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, by steamship, allowing and paying therefor, if by an American vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mails so conveyed.

To protect the postal revenue from losses incident to the unauthorized conveyance of letters by private ships or vessels departing from the United States for foreign countries, I recommend the passage of a law requiring, as a condition of clearance, that the master or commander of any steamship or other vessel departing for a foreign port or ports, shall make oath or affirmation that he has not received on board his ship or vessel, and has not under his care or within his control, any letters addressed to a foreign country which have not been received directly from the post office at the port of departure, except such as are directed to the consignee of the ship or vessel.

The United States postages upon the correspondence exchanged with Central and South America, via Aspinwall and Panama, amounted to $14,208 51, all of which was paid to Cornelius Vanderbilt for the sea and Isthmus transportation.

The provisions of article three of the United States and Canada postal convention have been so modified, by agreement between the respective post departments, as to abolish the international letter postage of fifteen cents per single rate, heretofore levied upon letters passing between Canada and California, Oregon, and Washington Territory, thus establishing a uniform international postage for letters of ten cents the single rate, prepayment optional, between Canada and all parts of the United States, without regard to distance or route of conveyance; and the benefit of the same uniform international rate of ten cents has also been extended to the correspondence exchanged with the province of New Brunswick.

Our arrangement with Canada adopts the principle of optional prepayment, in both countries, of the combined rate of international postage, each country retaining all the postage which it collects. It is the most simple form of international postal arrangement, inasmuch as it dispenses entirely with accounts between the respective post departments, and has been adopted with all the other provinces except Newfoundland. With the view of securing uniformity in our postal relations with those provinces, a recent effort was made to obtain the concurrence of Newfoundland in a like arrangement, which I regret to say was unsuccessful; the British post department declining to give its assent to the measure, on account of the additional British packet postage of fourpence sterling which is levied for the sea service to and from the island, and accrues to Great Britain.

The initiatory steps taken to conclude similar postal arrangements with the colonies of Vancouver's Island and British Columbia, referred to in the last annual report, have not as yet been attended with the success anticipated.

Additional articles to the United States and British postal convention have been agreed upon, constituting the British packet agency at Colon an office for the exchange of mails with the post office of New York, by means of the United States packets plying between those ports; the object being to prevent the delay to correspondence forwarded from the United States to ports and places on the Atlantic coast and interior of New Granada, previously caused by its transit across the Isthmus to and from Panama. A copy of these articles is annexed, (No. 8.)

An arrangement has also been concluded for expediting the transmission to destination of unpaid letters addressed to the United States, received at Panama by British packets from countries on the west coast of South America; this Department agreeing to collect, and account to Great Britain, through the office of the British packet agency at Panama, for the unpaid postage charged thereon.

An additional article to the United States and Bremen, and to the United States and Hamburg conventions, respectively, was executed on the 28th of March last, authorizing the conveyance of the international correspondence in time of war, or threatening war, by steamships sailing under neutral flag, whenever the same cannot be safely conveyed by United States, Bremen, or Hamburg steamships. Copies are annexed, (Nos. 9 and 10.) In view of the apprehension then felt that the war pending in the north of Europe might interrupt the mail service so long and advantageously performed by the Bremen and Hamburg lines of mail packets, steps were taken to ascertain whether the neutrality of the said steamers might not be secured by means of diplomatic correspondence, but this Department has not been advised of the result. Our postal conventions with Great Britain and Mexico, respectively, recognize the principle that, even in time of war between the contracting parties, their respective mail packets shall continue their navigation without impediment or molestation until six weeks after a notification given by either of the two Governments, and delivered to the other, that the service is to be discontinued; and as all Governments have a common interest in claiming exceptional treatment for mail packets in case of war, to the end of maintaining regularity in international postal communication, it is a subject worthy of consideration whether, by treaty stipulations between nations or otherwise, a like principle might not be established between all Governments, with proper safeguards against the transportation of persons or articles contraband of war.

During the past year a new line of French mail packets has been established between France and the United States, the steamships plying, for the present, direct between Havre and New York, and making regular departures from each port, on Wednesday of every fourth week. The United States exchange offices of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, dispatch and receive mails regularly by means of this line, corresponding with the French exchanging offices of Paris and Havre, and with the French mail agent embarked on board of each packet.

This Department has also concluded an arrangement for the transportation of the mails, fortnightly, between Boston and Halifax, Canso, and Pictou, (Nova Scotia,) and Charlottetown, (Prince Edward's Island,) the proprietors of the steamer to receive, as full compensation for the sea service, a moiety of the United States postages on the mails conveyed.

A correspondence has been opened with several of the post departments represented by commissioners at the Paris international postal conference, having for its object the negotiation of postal conventions, on the basis of the Paris resolutions, with those countries on the continent of Europe with which the United States has hitherto sustained no direct postal relation, as well as for the revision and amendment of existing postal conventions, so as to make them conform as nearly as practicable to the liberal principles of postal progress recommended by that conference as the basis of international arrangements. Favorable responses have been received from the several post departments interested in this subject.

In conformity with the provisions of the act "to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil," approved May 28, 1864, an advertisement was issued inviting proposals for carrying the mails of the United States by a monthly line of first-class American sea-going steamships, between a port of the United States north of the Potomac river, and Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, touching at St. Thomas, in the West Indies, and at Pernambuco and Bahia, in Brazil, for a contract term of ten years, to commence on or before the 1st day of September, 1865, and to date from the day the first steamship of such line shall leave the United States with the mails for Brazil.

Three proposals were received for this service, the lowest and the accepted bid being that of the New York, Nuevitas, and Cuba Steamship Company, with Thomas Asencio & Co. and Manuel J. Mora, of New York, as guarantors, for the performance of the required service, at the sum of $240,000 per annum, to be divided equally between the two Governments.

The act authorizing the establishment of this line of American steamships was the beginning of a new era in the history of our ocean mail service, which is being performed principally by steamers sailing under foreign flags. The Government, by this measure, adopted the policy of coöperating with the individual enterprise of our citizens in establishing a direct mail steamship communication with the principal country of South America, with the object of providing a reliable and speedy transmission of correspondence, and developing a profitable commerce, legitimately belonging to us by reason of our geographical position, but which has been diverted into other channels by means of regular steamship communications with other countries not so favorably situated as ours for conducting an extensive trade with Brazil.

At present our only regular and reliable route of postal communication with Brazil and adjacent South American States is by the circuitous route via Great Britain or France, each of those countries maintaining a subsidized line of mail steamers plying to and from Rio de Janeiro, established nominally for postal purposes, but really in the interest of commerce, which is fostered and developed by regular mail steamship communication.

There are other ocean routes besides the one to Brazil, which can be safely and profitably occupied by American lines of mail steamers, among which the route between San Francisco, Japan, and China, at present unoccupied by foreign mail packets, is perhaps the most important in a commercial point of view, and may be made available in securing to us a large participation in the commerce of the East, the greater portion of which is now enjoyed by Great Britain through her mail steamship connections, via Suez, in the Indian ocean and China seas.

The central position of the United States between eastern Asia and western Europe, affording routes but little longer, if any, than those now traversed between these distant regions, aided by the superior expedition of railway transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, will furnish such facilities as will make their adoption a practical necessity for the commercial intercourse between Europe and the populous countries of eastern Asia. These considerations, and others which will readily suggest themselves, render it important that the Pacific routes properly belonging to us should be occupied by American mail steamers, the profits of which, with the addition of a small subsidy for the mail service, would justify the establishment of one or more steamship lines, which would be remunerative to the proprietors.

Experience has demonstrated the impolicy of appropriating large sums of money out of the public Treasury to gratify a spirit of national emulation in the support of expensive mail service upon routes the profits of which are shared by the steamships of other nations, and without regard to the compensatory benefits to be derived from the development of our national resources; instead of granting incidental aid to such projected steamship lines to neighboring countries as promise to be self-supporting after their establishment, and open up to our citizens new avenues of profitable trade and commerce.

The principle adopted in the law authorizing mail steamship service to Brazil, of inviting competition for the service, is in such harmony with the spirit of our commercial policy, and promises so beneficial, results as to commend itself to my approval as one that should be invariably adhered to. But if there be a departure from this policy it may be well to consider the expediency of adopting the plan of using a portion of the large number of Government vessels that will be unemployed upon the restoration of peace, in the forming of mail lines with the principal commercial marts of the world in such manner as will promote the interests of commerce in the transportation of persons and property.

APPOINTMENTS.

Including the suspended post offices, the whole number on the 30th June, 1864, was 28,878; of which 19,976 are in the loyal, and 8,902 in the disloyal States. The number of presidential offices is 705, and 28,173 are under the appointment of the Postmaster General. The number of offices in each State and Territory at the close of the fiscal year is shown in the appendix, (table No. 11.)

During the year, 619 post offices have been established, 788 discontinued, and 211 changes made of names and sites. The number of cases acted upon was 5,579. Four thousand seven hundred and thirteen postmasters have been appointed, of whom 3,028 were to fill vacancies occasioned by resignations; 674 by removals; 259 by deaths; 133 by change of names and sites, and 619 on establishment of new offices. The details appear in the appendix, (table No. 12.)

Under the provisions of the act approved July 1, 1864, "to establish salaries for postmasters, and for other purposes," the salary of the postmaster of New York, and of the postmasters at offices of the first, second, and third classes, have been fixed as provided by law. (See appendix, table No. 13.)

The fifth section of the act above referred to authorizes the Postmaster General to allow at the office of New York, and at the offices of the first and second classes, a reasonable sum for the necessary cost of rent, fuel, lights, and clerks. No authority is given to allow for other necessary items, such as repairs of furniture, cleaning, stationery, printing, and other incidentals, required in large offices, and I beg leave to suggest that the necessary authority be given to appropriate a reasonable amount out of the revenues of the respective offices to meet such contingencies.

At the close of the fiscal year there were 20 special agents, whose salaries amounted to $34,100; 414 route agents, receiving $313,912; 53 local agents, $32,009; and 105 baggage masters in charge of through and express mails, $6,780.

The free delivery of mail matter by carriers has been introduced at 66 offices, employing, at present, 685 carriers, at an aggregate annual compensation of $317,061 22.

Tables are herewith annexed, showing the operations of the system. (See appendix, Nos. 14 and 15.)

DEAD LETTERS.

The number of dead letters of every description received and examined during the year was 3,508,825, being an increase of 958,409 over the preceding year, attributable mainly to the return of large numbers of Army and Navy letters which it was found impracticable to deliver.

During the year there were registered and re-mailed to the respective owners, as containing money, 25,752 letters, containing an aggregate of $131,611 24, of which number 20,059, containing $104,665 84, were delivered; 4,412 letters, containing $20,485 49, were returned to the Department, being addressed chiefly to soldiers and sailors, and persons transiently at places of mailing or address.

The number of dead letters containing papers of value, other than money, as deeds, bills of exchange, drafts, checks, &c., received, registered, and returned for delivery to the owners, was 12,436, and the nominal value of the inclosures therein was $1,615,694 75, being an increase over the previous year of 4,104, or about fifty per cent., while the increase in the value of the inclosures was but $71,416 94. The number of these letters delivered was 11,378, or ninety per cent.

During the year 45,380 letters and packages were received containing photographs, daguerreotypes, and articles of jewelry. Of this number, 29,999 were sent out for delivery, 26,607 of which contained photographs and daguerreotypes, 1,410 articles of jewelry, and 1,982 other miscellaneous articles. Of the whole number sent out, 18,213 were delivered to either the senders or parties addressed, the postage on which amounted to $1,944 24.

In May last a large number of packages containing miscellaneous articles which had been accumulating for several years, were classified and sold at public auction, the proceeds amounting to $1,175 27.

The number of valuable dead letters registered and sent out for delivery was 68,187, being 23,574 more than the preceding year, and there were returned to the Adjutant General's, Quartermaster General's, and other public offices, 11,116 letters and packages containing muster rolls, descriptive lists, and soldiers' discharge papers; 66,691 letters containing postage stamps and money in less sums than one dollar, or articles of less than one dollar in value, were returned to the senders.

The number of letters which it was found impossible to forward from the offices where deposited, or to deliver to the parties addressed, because of the postage being unpaid, or on account of being illegibly directed, and which were in consequence sent to the dead letter office, was 115,812. Of this number, 72,074 were "held for postage," being addressed to foreign countries, to which the prepayment of postage is compulsory, or to those countries with which the United States have no postal arrangement; 38,068 of the number were "misdirected," or so imperfectly or illegibly addressed that their destination could not be ascertained. A large number of this last class were without any address whatever, and in many instances contained inclosures of value.

During the year there were received at the Department 5,112 applications for missing letters, for all of which examinations were made and the applicants notified of the result.

A large number of letters addressed to rebel localities have been returned from various sources to the dead letter office, amounting in the aggregate to 31,423, of which number 28,421 were of domestic, and 3,002 of foreign origin. They were all indorsed "mails suspended," and returned, the domestic to the writers, and the foreign to the countries in which they originated.

Within the past year, 4,256 letters addressed to fictitious persons or firms were sent by postmasters to the dead letter office, and thence returned to writers or senders. The addresses were assumed, evidently, for the purpose of conducting some fraudulent business, and in many instances these letters were found to contain remittances.

Under the provisions of the act approved January 21, 1862, 1,068,499 ordinary dead letters, or those not evidently worthless, were returned to the writers, after having been placed in new envelopes. Out of this number, 4,044 were returned to banks and insurance companies, 90,856 to business firms, and 917,599 to individuals. Included in the above aggregate are 9,761 letters returned free of postage; these consisted of official letters from the various Departments, and letters sent to the various hospitals for sick and wounded soldiers. Forty-one thousand and sixteen dead letters written in foreign languages were also returned during the year.

About 24½ per cent. of the whole number sent out for delivery to the writers failed to be delivered, and were again returned to the Department.

The gross revenue derived from the dead letter postage collected on the letters sent out and delivered amounted to $23,558 28, out of which were paid the clerks employed in directing them. The collection of postage on such returned letters complicates the accounts under the law fixing salaries for postmasters. These letters must be entered at the mailing, and then at the receiving office, and postage collected; and such as cannot be delivered must be credited to the postmaster when sent to the dead letter office. The aim of the Department is to have no unpaid letters in the mails, and to collect all revenues by means of postage stamps, avoiding the necessity of keeping accounts. In future postmasters are to enter in their accounts only unpaid letters, which are mostly from or to foreign countries, and it seems inconsistent to send thousands daily from this Department with instructions to enter them and collect postage. The amount is comparatively small, and yet the attendant labor very considerable. I therefore suggest, as a matter for the consideration of Congress, the propriety of restoring prepaid letters to the owners free of postage, especially in view of the fact that a very large proportion go to persons of moderate means.

The number of domestic letters of all descriptions sent out from the dead letter office during the year was 1,403,998. In addition to these, large numbers of letters, bearing requests for their return to the writers if unclaimed a specified time, are returned by postmasters without passing through the dead letter office, and constant efforts are made to promote this mode of return.

The number of letters returned unopened to foreign countries during the year was 162,591, the amount of unpaid postage on which was $9,161 53. The number received from foreign countries in the same condition during the same period was 62,427, and the amount of unpaid postage thereon $2,088 57. (For particulars see table No. 16 of appendix.)

During the first year of the rebellion the number of letters which passed between the United States and European countries decreased, while at the same time the ratio of letters returned increased. Each subsequent year the correspondence has been increasing, while the ratio of dead letters returned to Europe has decreased. (See table No. 17 of appendix.)

By authority of an act of Congress, the unclaimed money from dead letters is used to promote the efficiency of the dead letter office, by providing temporary clerks to assist in the examination and return of letters. The fund thus realized was $5,083 47, to which was added the proceeds of the sale hereinbefore referred to—$1,175 27—making a total of $6,258 74. Deducting the amount expended for clerks, $2,966 82, and incidental expenses, $32 80, a balance remained June 30, 1864, of $3,259 12.

POSTAL MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

The act approved May 17, 1864, authorized the Postmaster General to establish, "under such rules and regulations as he may find expedient and necessary, a uniform money-order system at all post offices which he may deem suitable therefor;" and it further provided that this system should be put into operation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865.

A superintendent and assistant have been appointed, one hundred and forty-one post offices have been designated as money-order offices, and the operation of the system commenced on the 1st instant.

38TH CONG...2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, December 5, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to submit for your information, and the consideration of Congress, the following synopsis of results attained during the past year in those branches of the public service which have been placed by law under the supervision and control of this Department.

From the foundation of the Government to the present time the management and disposal of the public lands have engrossed a large share of the public attention. Of the 2,000,000,000 acres embraced in the territorial extent of the United States, 1,400,000,000 belonged to the public domain.

By a liberal policy in granting and selling lands, about one third of this vast patrimony has been disposed of, leaving about 1,000,000,000 acres still the property of the Government. About one fourth of all the laws that have been enacted by Congress relate to the public lands, and to the settlement of the land claims derived from the Governments which formerly had jurisdiction of the soil.

At some periods of our national history, a considerable income to the Treasury was derived from sales, and at others, the cash receipts declined to a sum but little exceeding the cost of administering the land system. During the first sixty years of the present century, the average income from sales was $2,750,000 per year, and the quantity disposed of by sales, and for military bounties, was about 205,000,000 acres.

During the last ten years the income from lands was less than during the preceding decade. This was occasioned by the large quantities of land—granted for internal improvements and for military and other purposes—which have competed, in the market, with the lands of the United States; and, more recently, by the passage of the homestead law, under which large quantities have been entered at nominal rates. The annual receipts from ordinary sales for four years past have been as follows:

For the year ending June 30, 1861.....	$884,887 03
For the year ending June 30, 1862.....	125,048 30
For the year ending June 30, 1863.....	136,077 95
For the year ending June 30, 1864.....	678,007 21

The depressing influences of civil war have been felt during the last three years, but the results for that just closed demonstrate a revival of the annual demand for the public lands, particularly for settlement and cultivation.

During the year ending June 30, 1864, public lands have been disposed of as follows:

Acres sold for cash.....	432,773.90
Acres located with military warrants.....	515,900.00
Acres located with agricultural scrip.....	214,418.14
Acres certified to States for railroads.....	857,180.87
Acres taken under the homestead law.....	1,261,592.61

Acres disposed of during the year.....	3,381,865.52
During the quarter ending September 30, 1864, the aggregate quantity taken for the same purpose was.....	939,476.90

Making a total of.....4,321,342.42

The cash receipts for sales, homestead and location fees for the same five quarters, were $1,019,446 44.

The aggregate quantity of public lands surveyed, but not disposed of, was, on the 30th September last, 133,517,587 acres. This has been the average quantity for several years past. The amount surveyed annually has been about equal to that disposed of annually.

Nineteen States have accepted the provisions of the acts donating lands "for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and have received land and land scrip amounting to 4,950,000 acres.

The jurisdiction conferred on this Department by the act of Congress of March 3, 1851, for the definite location of confirmed private land claims in California was taken from it by an act approved June 14, 1860, but has been recently restored under the act approved July 1, 1864. The quantity of land embraced in all the confirmations to the present date is 4,366,974 acres; of which 2,430,906.60 acres have been finally surveyed and patented. What remains to be done, in the important work of severing the private from the public lands in that State, will be prosecuted with diligence, and brought to completion as rapidly as possible.

Under the acts, of Congress of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, making grants of land to aid the construction of railroad and telegraph lines to the Pacific coast, the initial point of the main line of railroad from the Missouri river westward has been fixed at Omaha, Nebraska, and the definite location of the road for one hundred miles west from that point has been approved by the President. The route of the Pacific railroad of California has been selected, and a map of the preliminary location thereof, from Sacramento eastward to the great bend of the Truckee river, in Nevada, has been filed in this Department. The lands along these routes for twenty-five miles, on both sides, have been withdrawn from market, pursuant to the requirements of the act of 1862.

In the administration of the laws regulating the grants of swamp lands to the States, and authorizing the allowance of indemnity in certain cases, where swamp lands have been sold by the United States, a liberal construction has been adopted and a generous policy pursued. No alteration of these laws is demanded by principles of justice. An extension of the indemnity, or of the time now prescribed by law for selecting swamp lands, would, in my opinion, be prejudicial to the interests of the United States.

The claim of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church to lands at the Dalles of the Columbia river in Oregon, based upon the first section of the act of Congress approved August 14, 1848, having been brought before this Department upon appeal on the 27th of April last, I requested the advice of the Attorney General of the United States touching the law arising upon the facts disclosed by the papers in the case. On the 27th of May I had the honor to receive his reply, stating that, in his opinion, the question presented was "purely judicial, and not proper to be determined by an executive officer." In deference to this opinion, the Department declined making a decision in that and a similar case then before it. Proceedings in all such cases under that act have been suspended in the General Land Office and in the subordinate offices in Oregon.

For further details in reference to the public lands, I respectfully refer to the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

During the past year additional discoveries of precious metals, particularly of silver, have been made in the region flanking, on the eastward, the extended mountain ranges of the Sierra Nevada. A vast belt of some one or two hundred miles in width, and eight or nine hundred in length, embracing portions of Idaho, Nevada, and Arizona, is rich in silver ore. Owing to the remote locality of these mines, and the difficulty of transportation thereto, but little machinery well adapted to the rapid and economical reduction of the various ores has been introduced. In that portion of Nevada through which the Pacific railroad will pass, many rich veins have been found, and it is estimated by persons familiar with the subject, that, if the mines now opened there were supplied with the proper machinery, they would yield $10,000,000 per month. In the same region vast beds of salt have also been found, which, from its value in the process of separating the silver in the ores, has given a fresh impulse to mining. When we reflect that the region of country in which deposits of the precious metals abound includes large portions of three States and six Territories, and that the richest veins of ore heretofore discovered are as yet but slightly developed, while new discoveries are constantly made, it will be perceived that the annual product of the mines in the United States must soon reach a magnitude without precedent in the history of mining operations.

The wealth imbedded in the rocks of that extensive region is actually inexhaustible, and it will furnish in future years, indirectly, a principal part of our means of liquidating the debt contracted by the Government for the overthrow of the great rebellion. As a measure tending to accelerate the reduction of these vast mineral deposits into available wealth, and to strengthen the

The maximum amount for which a money order can be issued is fixed by law at thirty dollars, the object of the system being to afford a cheap, immediate, and safe agency for the transfer through the mails of small sums of money. The tendency of the system is to exclude money from the mails, the presence of which in letters is a frequent cause of the loss of correspondence; even when the latter does not contain money. The limit of thirty dollars is believed to be sufficiently large to include all that class of remittances now sent in money through the mails, but in exceptional cases more than one order can be procured. The average amount contained in each money letter received at the dead letter office during the fiscal year 1862 was $4 53; during 1863, it was $4 20; and in 1864, $5 18; showing that, as a rule, money remittances by mail are made in small amounts.

The mode by which safety in the transfer of money is secured, consists in leaving out of the order the name of the payee or party for whom the money is intended. In this respect a money order differs from an ordinary bank draft or check. When a money order is applied for, the postmaster will furnish the applicant with a printed form of application, in which the latter will enter all the particulars of amount, the name, address, &c., required to be stated in the money order and advice. From the items contained in such application the postmaster will fill up the money order and also the corresponding form of advice. The order, when completed, is handed to the applicant, upon payment of the sum expressed therein and of the fee chargeable thereon. By the mail immediately following the issue of a money order, the postmaster transmits the corresponding advice to the postmaster at the office upon which it is drawn. The latter is thus furnished, before the order itself can be presented, with the necessary information to detect fraud, if any should be attempted. A money order is rendered invalid unless it is presented to the postmaster on whom it is drawn within ninety days from its date; but the Postmaster General can issue a new order on the application of the payee, upon the payment of a second fee. The same course is to be pursued should the order be lost. In this case, the payee is to furnish a statement, under oath, that the order has been lost or destroyed, accompanied by the certificate of the postmaster that it has not been paid, and will not be paid if thereafter presented. The payee may transfer his order to another party by his indorsement to that effect; but more than one indorsement is prohibited. Persons, therefore, residing at places in the vicinity of those designated in the list of money-order offices can generally avail themselves of this system.

In commencing the money-order business, it has been deemed expedient to begin with the larger offices, and extend it to others as rapidly as possible. Measures will also be taken for its introduction in the Army.

The establishment of the system in this country will no doubt lead to arrangements for the interchange of international money orders with the several foreign countries with which we have direct postal relations.

By the eleventh section of the act above referred to, postmasters are prohibited from depositing in any bank, money-order funds of which they have the custody. I would respectfully suggest that the business would be facilitated by enabling the postmasters having moneys from this source to deposit in the national banks designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as depositories of the public moneys, to their own credit, and at their risk, and thereby relieve the Department from the necessity of furnishing vaults and safes. Substantial advantages would also result to the public interests by permitting all deputy postmasters to deposit in these banks any public moneys in their hands, under like conditions; and I recommend such modification of the law as will authorize such deposits to be made under the direction of the Postmaster General.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM DENNISON,
Postmaster General.

The President.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

public credit by an authentic publication of our vast resources, I respectfully recommend that provision be made for the appointment of experienced and skillful mineralogists to make a scientific examination of the principal mining localities, and of the mineral regions generally, and to report the results. Their reports should be printed and widely circulated. An appropriation would be required for these purposes.

Much interest has been manifested in favor of the establishment of a bureau of mines and minerals, to which the administration of all details in respect to this important subject should be committed. I am satisfied that such legislation will, before many years, be found necessary, if it has not already become so.

The attention of Congress has frequently been called to the importance of securing an income to the national Treasury from the products of the mines and placers. By the laws of Spain and Mexico, and according to the principles generally accepted in civilized countries, the property in these precious deposits is vested in the Government exercising sovereignty and jurisdiction over the soil.

The first annual report from this Department contained a number of suggestions relating to the protection of this property, and to securing a revenue from the annual products. Since that time the same subject has been frequently mentioned in the annual reports of this Department, but Congress has never taken legislative action. Sound policy dictates the propriety of levying a revenue tax upon those who are engaged in gathering individual wealth from this national property. The Bureau of Internal Revenue, recently established in the Department of the Treasury, furnishes a ready and suitable instrumentality for collecting it. The requirement of a moderate license fee from each person engaged in placer mining upon the public domain, and a reasonable tax upon the products of all mines, which might be graduated according to the cost of production, would be just to the Government and satisfactory to the mining interest.

When it is considered that a nominal tax of one per cent. upon the present product of the mines would yield a larger income than is now derived from the sales of the public lands, with an expense of collecting it comparatively small, and that the prospective revenue from this source is so great, the impolicy of granting the mines and mineral lands in fee, without consideration, must be apparent to all. It should, however, be borne in mind that the business of developing the mineral resources of those regions is yet in its infancy, and that all legislation bearing upon it should have for its object the increase of the annual products of the precious metals, and should, in its inception, be directed to the encouragement of the miner, by affording him security in his possessions and stability to his business, rather than to obtaining an immediate income to the Treasury.

With the prospect of returning peace, and the consequent increase of migration to the mining regions likely thereafter to ensue, it seems to be demanded of Congress that the rights of miners should be defined and secured by law, and the prosperity of those regions and the preservation of good order therein thus insured.

The mines of New Mexico and Arizona are probably not inferior in richness to any within the limits of the United States. Owing to their inaccessibility they are indifferently wrought. All efforts to make them available must necessarily be feeble and attended with but partial success until roads shall have been constructed through those Territories from the Atlantic States or from the navigable waters of the Pacific. Since the acquisition of this portion of our domain, now a period of seventeen years, the United States have received no income from the sale of lands within it, and but an inconsiderable sum from the sale of lands in southeastern California. It is believed that the larger portion of the land in that section, adapted to agriculture, is covered by Spanish and Mexican grants or set apart for Indian pueblos. There is therefore but a slight prospect that anything will be realized from sales of the lands, or that they will ever be located by homestead settlers. The wants and habits of the population are not such as to give any assurance or afford any expectation that they will undertake from their own means to prosecute to a successful completion the roads necessary to the development of the vast mineral riches of the country.

A further discouragement to the settlement of Arizona and southern California has been the continued drought which has prevailed for the last two years, and from which most of the herds of cattle and sheep accustomed to graze there have perished.

The desert of California, known as the Colorado desert, covering a territory of nearly one hundred miles in extent, was evidently at one time watered by the Colorado river. Being for the most part depressed below the bed of that river, it is susceptible of reclamation from its present condition, by means of dams and acequias, the construction of which, although not difficult, is, without substantial aid from Congress, beyond the means of the inhabitants. These combined difficulties render it probable, nay, almost certain, that the Government will, under existing circumstances, derive no benefit either from the barren lands or from the mineral wealth which abounds in those Territories.

There can be no doubt that the public resources would be much increased by the immediate working of the mines to the extent of their capacity, and by the settlement of those regions by an enterprising and industrious population, though no direct income should be derived from the sale of the lands. It is therefore worthy of consideration whether it would not be expedient to grant all, or such portions of the lands, as are requisite to insure the construction of the necessary railroads, and the conversion of the sterile lands to a condition of fertility. The benefits resulting from such roads would not be confined to the product of the mines. A new highway, at all times exempt from obstruction by snow, would be open to the Pacific. Passing by the valley of the Rio Grande to El Paso, it would receive a large portion of the rich commerce of central and western Mexico. These benefits are so obvious and of such surpassing importance, that I do not hesitate in expressing my earnest conviction that the Government should embrace any suitable opportunity which may be offered to secure the completion of a railroad upon the terms suggested.

It appears from a communication of General Dix, the president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, that it has, since the adjournment of Congress, expended more than half a million dollars upon the main line of the road leading westward from Omaha, of which one hundred miles have been permanently located, and forty miles are in process of construction.

The company has surveyed lines to Salt Lake City, through the South Pass, Laramie Plains, Bridger's Pass by way of Timpanagos and Weber rivers, to determine the most feasible route. Parties have also been engaged in explorations in Colorado Territory through Berthold's Pass and up the Caché la Poudre river, and also in examining the topography of the country in the vicinity of the one hundredth meridian of longitude, and in locating the line from Omaha to Fort Kearney. Considering the limited time which has elapsed since the action of Congress enabled this company to prosecute the work with energy, satisfactory progress has been made, and the country has no reason to apprehend any tardiness in the prosecution of this great enterprise.

The progress made in the construction of the branch road in Kansas, known as the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, has not met the reasonable expectations of the public. There was just reason to believe that the second section of forty miles of that road would have been rapidly approaching completion, if not actually completed, by this time; instead of which, forty miles only of the track are laid, and that not yet in a condition to be examined by the commissioners appointed by the President to inspect and report upon the work.

For this unexpected state of affairs the company is not altogether without excuse. The assassination of its contractor in July last, soon after the adjournment of Congress, the continued insurmountable difficulties of obtaining the necessary materials, either by river or rail, from causes known to all, prevented them for a time from prosecuting the work. Since these difficulties have been partially removed, a commendable energy has marked the conduct of the company. The first section of the road to Lawrence, to which place the track is laid, will undoubtedly be open to the public and in use within a few days. The company in California is also making satisfactory progress with its portion of the road.

The President has appointed George Ashmun of Massachusetts, Springer Harbaugh of Pennsylvania, Charles T. Sherman of Ohio, Jesse L. Williams of Indiana, and Timothy J. Carter of Illinois, to be directors, on the part of the United States, in the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and these gentlemen have accepted the appointment. The wisdom of Congress in providing for the appointment of such officers cannot be doubted.

Being impressed with the conviction of the importance of securing the interest of the Government in the roads connecting with the main line, and the faithful compliance, by the companies constructing them, with the terms and conditions upon which they are entitled to the munificent bounties offered by Congress, I should not hesitate to recommend, if it were deemed practicable, that such directors should be ex officio members of the board or other governing authority of each of such companies. I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, with the hope that some means will be devised by which a supervisory control over the action of such companies may, within proper limits, be conferred upon the directors on the part of the United States.

The management of the Indians during the past year has been attended with difficulty. In addition to the war against that portion of the Sioux that committed the massacres in Minnesota in 1862, and who are yet unpunished and unsubdued, military operations have been carried on against the combined bands of the Sioux of the plains and of the Upper Missouri, as well as against a considerable portion of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, particularly those who have been accustomed to inhabit the country of the Upper Platte river, and who were parties to the treaty of Fort Laramie. It is not necessary to inquire whether, by adopting conciliatory measures, these military operations might not, to a great extent, have been avoided. Those who desire to investigate the subject may, with advantage, consult the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The question of interest is, what course shall hereafter be pursued with these Indians in order to reduce them to subjection, and to afford all needful protection to our citizens? The overland mail to Colorado, and to the States and Territories west thereof, as well as a large proportion of the carriers of goods, and of the emigrants to those regions, passes over the Laramie plains, which are infested during a large portion of the year by these Indians. The route of the Pacific railroad passes through the same country, and the Government is, by act of Congress, under obligation to extinguish the Indian title. The Government has but one treaty—that of Fort Laramie—with the Sioux (of Dakota) and with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes between the forks of the Platte river, which these latter Indians have ever acknowledged. This treaty was ratified by the Senate with amendments, and its benefits to the Indians, by virtue of the limitations imposed by the Senate, are about to terminate. A sufficient reservation for the Cheyennes and Arapahoes has been established on the Upper Arkansas, in the vicinity of Fort Lyon, and efforts have been made which promise success to make it a suitable and permanent home for them. The treaty referred to forbids the occupation of the Platte country by the whites, and only permits their transit through it.

To enable the Union Pacific Railroad Company to establish its line of road through this country, it is necessary that the United States shall have the unmolested possession of the route, and of much of the adjacent country. To secure that object, however, I do not think it important that any further treaties should be made with these Indians. Their violation of the existing treaty, in making war upon our people, renders this unnecessary, if the views which are hereinafter expressed shall be approved by Congress. As the most expeditious mode to accomplish the object, it is recommended that the agency at the Upper Platte be abolished, and that the number of military posts along the line of the railroad and overland mail route be increased sufficiently to protect it and exclude the Indians therefrom.

This Department will make provision for such Indians as will submit to its authority and locate upon the reservation. Those who resist should be pursued by the military, and punished.

With these Indians—the Sioux—and all others in hostility with the United States, trade and intercourse should be interdicted until they yield to the will and direction of the Government. To this end, I recommend that a law be passed, making it a penal offense for any person to carry goods, or supplies of any kind whatever, into their country, for traffic; and that all persons, of whatever pursuit, shall be prohibited from trading or trafficking with them while they are in a state of hostility.

Much has been said, and the public mind has lately been agitated, against the policy of the Government in making treaties with Indian tribes, and some persons in authority advise an abrogation of all existing treaties; but it is presumed that, while this nation is governed by the rules of civilization, such a proposition will not be entertained to the injury of all the tribes and nations of Indians who are in amity with the United States. Where the Indians have kept faith with the Government, no question of expediency or policy will justify a violation of its pledges to them. There are, however, many Indians within the domain of the United States, with whom the Government has no treaties acknowledging the primary right of soil in the tribes; with these, possibly, with some exceptions, it would be wise to abstain from making any treaty recognizing such right. Suitable reservations should be selected for them, and means adopted to establish them thereon, and to enable them, by their own industry, to sustain themselves. This policy has already been introduced successfully in the management of the Indians in California, and may properly be applied, to a considerable extent, in the neighboring States and Territories. In negotiating new treaties, where good policy or existing engagements will admit of that course of action, stipulations for the payment of money annuities should be avoided.

The propriety of the removal of the Navajos of New Mexico and Arizona to the Bósque Redondo reservation has been a subject of much contrariety of opinion. This Department, upon the best information at its command, consented to their removal. As the reservation has been set apart, and a large sum of money expended by the military authorities in the endeavor to permanently establish the Indians there, great fickleness of purpose would be manifested in abandoning the enterprise before it shall have been fully and fairly tested. I am strongly inclined to the opinion, notwithstanding all that has been urged against it, that, if the scheme receives a fair and just support, it will prove a success, and these Indians, so long the foes of the Government, will become its faithful supporters.

For further and detailed information on the subject of Indian affairs I respectfully refer to the elaborate report of the Commissioner.

The liberal provisions of law for the payment of pensions to soldiers and seamen who have been disabled in the service of the country, and to the widows, orphans, and dependent mothers and sisters of such as have fallen in battle or died of disease or wounds, have been administered with industry, fidelity, and promptitude.

The very interesting and instructive report of the Commissioner of Pensions affords valuable information, and presents important suggestions, in which I fully concur.

Of those patriots to whom pensions for services in the revolutionary war had been awarded five still survive at very advanced ages. At the beginning of the year twelve were living, and 1,418 widows of revolutionary soldiers were receiving pensions, making 1,430 pensioners of this class—the aggregate of whose yearly stipends was $115,217 43.

The number of Army pensioners (other than revolutionary) who were paid during the fourteen months ending the 30th of June last was 22,767, and of widows, (other than revolutionary,) orphans, and dependent mothers, 25,433.

The total number of persons who received pensions during that period was therefore 49,630, and the amount paid for Army pensions during the year ending June 30, was $4,340,368 60.

The number of Navy pensioners who were paid during the fourteen months preceding the date mentioned was 1,505; and the amount of money paid them during the year was $164,247 92. The whole number of pensioners on the 30th June last was 51,135, requiring, for their annual compensation, $4,595,376 33.

During the year ending September 30, 1864, 1,812 bounty land warrants were issued, requiring 286,960 acres of land to satisfy them.

The act of Congress, approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to grant pensions," is believed to be one of the wisest and most munificent enactments of the kind ever adopted by any nation. Its beneficial provisions extend to the disabled survivors, and to the widows, orphans, dependent mothers, and dependent orphan sisters of the deceased soldiers and seamen of every grade and rank.

During the past year more than $3,500,000 have been paid for pensions granted on account of disability or death ensuing from service in the war of the rebellion. During the continuance of the war, no reliable estimate can be made of the amount of money that will be required eventually to meet the obligations thus assumed by the Government to our soldiers and seamen.

The list of pensioners is constantly undergoing both increase and diminution, and at present, and for months to come, it must be rapidly augmented, even should peace be restored without further hostilities. It is estimated that more than $7,000,000 will be required to satisfy the claims accruing under the pension laws during the current fiscal year.

In fixing the grade of disability of invalid pensioners, and in discriminating as to the connection of the causes of disability or death with the service, the Pension Office is often involved in doubt and uncertainty.

It is believed that a commission of experienced surgeons might devise and mature such a schedule of usual causes of disability and death, in cases where pensions have been and are claimed, as would greatly aid the Pension Office in reaching correct conclusions—in discriminating between those cases where the cause should be regarded as incident to the service, and those in which the cause has no relation to, or connection with, military or naval duty. While it is conceded that, in cases of great doubt and uncertainty, conclusions should be in favor of claimants, all must agree that a wise precaution should be taken to guard against mistakes, and that every means of enlarging information upon the topic suggested must be promotive of justice both to claimants and to the Government.

The report of the Commissioner of Pensions shows the importance of the provisions of law requiring periodical examinations of invalid pensioners, and contains a list of the names of the examining surgeons.

This Department has recently been advised that, under the joint resolution of Congress, approved July 1, 1864, the sum of $5,000,000 of the Navy pension fund has been invested in registered bonds of the United States.

I commend to the consideration of Congress the suggestion of the Commissioner, that an appropriation for pension purposes should be made of a portion of the proceeds of abandoned and confiscated property on land. It occurs to me as eminently proper that some of the means derived from these sources should be applied to the establishment of homes for those who have been, or may hereafter be, permanently disabled and rendered helpless by reason of their service during the existing war.

It was recommended to Congress at its last session that an act be passed requiring the national banks to discharge the duties of pension agents. It was believed that by that instrumentality the convenience of the pensioners would be greatly promoted, and the expense attending the employment of agents avoided. Since the adjournment of Congress, communications have been received from most of those banks, expressing a willingness to perform the duty without charge to the Government. I renew the recommendation that a law be passed charging the banks with the payment of pensions whenever it shall be the pleasure of the Department to require it of them.

Since the last annual report of this Department, seven additional agencies for paying pensions have been established, and it is believed that the number now in operation will be sufficient to transact the business, should the present system of payments be continued.

The business operations of the Patent Office for the year ending September 30 last have been very satisfactory. During the period above named, 6,740 applications for patents and 989 caveats were filed; 29 applications also were made for the extension of patents previously granted. During the same period 4,843 patents, including reissues and designs, were issued, and 40 extensions granted. The number of applications awaiting the payment of the final fee required by law before patents can be issued has largely increased, numbering now over 1,000. The finances of the office are in a prosperous condition, as appears by the following short statement:

The balance in the Treasury to the credit of the patent fund on October 1, 1863, was $37,732 63. The receipts of the office to September 30, 1864, amounted to $230,838 60, making a total sum of $268,571 23. The expenditures during the same period were $212,453 84, leaving a balance of $56,117 39 on hand on October 1, 1864, being $18,384 76 more than the balance as exhibited on October 1, 1863.

The report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings presents many details of interest to the citizens and residents of this District, and contains information in respect to the manner in which various appropriations for local purposes have been applied. The condition of the streets and avenues of Washington city is a matter of frequent and just complaint. The United States has never assumed any general jurisdiction of the subject, although appropriations for improving the avenues have been frequently made.

The city authorities, apparently relying upon the liberality of Congress, have abstained from making expenditures in improving and opening streets commensurate with the constant increase of population and business. This state of affairs is likely to continue until a definite arrangement is established between the Government and the city in relation to the matter under consideration. I therefore renew the recommendation made last year, that street commissioners should be appointed to determine the description and extent of the annual repairs and improvements to avenues, streets, and alleys; and that the funds requisite should be provided by the United States and the city in proportions to be fixed by law. The property-holders of Washington, moved by a just pride in the prosperity and beauty of the city, will not hesitate to tax themselves liberally to maintain a constant and efficient system of street improvement. The present rate of municipal taxation, for all purposes, is about one per cent. on real and personal property, which is less than is paid in any other city with which I am acquainted. The tax-payers here are not charged with the expense of maintaining a State government, or those institutions of a benevolent character which are usually sustained by other communities, and they will not shrink from taxation for local purposes, when their property is yielding a rate of income equaled in few other cities and towns of the country. The propriety of these remarks is still more apparent, when it is considered that the expenses of the judicial tribunals for both civil and criminal business, and of the police force, are principally paid by the Government, and are not charged to the property-holders of the city or District. Recognizing, however, the duty of the Government to make provision for the improvement and repair of streets extending through public grounds, and to aid in keeping in a suitable condition such as are in front of the public buildings, I would respectfully recommend that provision be made by Congress for paying F street, between Seventh and Ninth streets. SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

Nicholson pavement, by reason of its durability, smoothness, and elasticity, has met with marked favor. In view of the probability that measures will be adopted by Congress providing some plan for suitably paving Pennsylvania avenue, and other principal thoroughfares of the city, I have obtained an estimate of the expense of laying the Nicholson pavement in F street, along the southern front of the building occupied by this Department.

By joint resolution No. 56, of June, 1864, the Secretary of the Interior was, among other things, directed to "prevent the improper appropriation or occupation of any of the public streets," &c., in the city of Washington. One of the objects of this resolution evidently was to prevent the rebuilding of the Center market-house upon its present site. Notice was accordingly given to the authorities of the city to desist from the erection of the building that had just been commenced, and they thereupon suspended the work upon it. The authorities manifest a commendable disposition to make this necessary improvement in such place and manner as will meet the approbation of Congress.

The substantial and rapid progress of the city for the last three years, its increasing and energetic population, and the certainty of its future prosperity, evince the importance of immediate action having for its object the improvement of its sewerage, the cleansing of the canal—so as to correct, as far as possible, its present unwholesome and offensive condition—and the adornment of the streets and public grounds, thereby making the metropolis of the nation healthy and attractive. To that end, in addition to the suggestions contained in my last annual report, it is recommended that Congress provide by law for the removal of the Center market-house from its present site, and the extension of the Smithsonian grounds to Pennsylvania avenue. It is also advised that the public reservations bordering on the canal and adjoining the Smithsonian grounds be added thereto. The enlarged area which the proposed change would give to these grounds, their adornment by the planting of trees and shrubbery, and the erection of fountains, would add greatly to the comfort, health, and pleasure of a populous portion of the city, and be most agreeable and attractive to transient visitors. The space occupied by the canal from Seventh street to Sixth street and the contiguous reservation, would afford ample room for the market-house. The expense of making this space available is not worthy of consideration, in view of the substantial benefits to be obtained by extending the Smithsonian grounds to the avenue. It is believed that Congress may, without interfering with any right of the city of Washington, make such disposition of the canal as it shall deem proper; and if it should be determined to extend the sewer, now being constructed through the botanic garden, along and in the canal to the river, and to fill up the residue of the canal, there can be but little doubt that the grounds thus reclaimed for building and other useful purposes will be equal in value to the expense of this improvement.

The approaching completion of the Capitol, under the direction of the architect, Mr. Walter, imparts much interest to his report upon that and kindred subjects. Accompanying it are plans and drawings of the surrounding grounds which he proposes to add to those of the Capitol, in order to render them, in his opinion, reasonably spacious and suitable to the building. His views appear to me to be correct and judicious. They do not require the purchase of any private property, and should they be adopted by Congress, it is recommended that measures be taken and the necessary appropriations be made to grade, embellish, and inclose the grounds.

Owing to the increased cost of construction, additional appropriations for the completion of the work are necessary. I refer to the report of the architect for particulars upon this subject.

The east and west wings and the north front of the building occupied by this Department have never been thoroughly repainted since their erection. The pavements of the corridors in the south front, now much worn, and partly laid with bricks, should be relaid with marble, so as to conform to those in the newer portions of the building. For these purposes an estimate for an appropriation has been submitted.

The work upon the Potomac dam and Washington aqueduct, authorized at the last session, has been prosecuted with all practicable dispatch. The extreme scarcity of skilled labor and well known local causes have, however, seriously impeded its progress; and its condition is not so far advanced as was confidently anticipated. An appropriation of $51,945 is required to pay for the work now under contract, and which should be completed before the close of the present fiscal year. The report of the engineer contains full information in regard to the expenditures hitherto made, as well as those that will be required to finish the aqueduct in a proper manner.

The ninth annual report of the Board of Visitors of the Government Hospital for the Insane shows that the institution has rendered very valuable service to the country during the past year. The whole number of patients under treatment during the year ending June 30, 1864, was 787, of whom 565 were from the Army, 35 from the Navy, and 6 were rebel prisoners. The number of patients remaining at the end of the year was 351, of whom 191 were from the Army, 18 from the Navy, 4 from the rebel army, 2 from the Soldiers' Home, and 136 from civil life. The number discharged during the year as "recovered" was 288, "improved" 69, "unimproved" 5, deceased 74; total 436. The financial exhibit made by the board in their report is satisfactory. The extended service performed has necessarily involved an expenditure somewhat beyond the appropriation. The deficiency will, I doubt not, be supplied by Congress. The report of the superintendent points out the improvements upon the buildings and grounds that are deemed desirable.

The Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind appears, from the annual report of the board of directors, to be in a prosperous condition. Hon. Amos Kendall, to whose liberality and philanthropy it is indebted for its existence, retired from the presidency thereof some months since and was succeeded by Mr. E. M. Gallaudet, its former efficient and accomplished superintendent. A collegiate department for the deaf and dumb has been inaugurated under the recent act of Congress authorizing the board to confer degrees. The Potomac water has been conveyed to the premises; but the arrangements for lighting the building with gas have not been completed. The appropriation of $26,000 made at the last session of Congress for enlarging the grounds has been expended in the purchase of nearly fourteen acres contiguous to the former premises on the north and west. The number of pupils on the 1st day of July, 1863, was fifty-two, and on the 1st day of July, 1864, fifty-eight. During the year eighty-one have received instruction, of whom seventy-two were mutes, and nine blind; and at the date of the report there were seventy-three pupils.

The State of Maryland having established an institution at Baltimore for the blind, the board has expressed the opinion that the blind of this District, on account of their small number, could be better instructed at Baltimore, and has recommended that their transfer to and support in that institution be sanctioned by law. This recommendation is submitted to the consideration of Congress.

The report of the president of the board of police commissioners, prepared in obedience to the requirements of the fourth section of the "act to create a metropolitan police district," &c., gives information in respect to the service performed by the officers and men during the past year. The number of patrolmen is one hundred and fifty, officered by a superintendent and ten sergeants. The police district embraces about seventy square miles, with a population of 150,000 or 160,000 souls. The number of arrests made during the past year was 23,545; of those thus arrested there have been committed to jail 1,010; given bail for appearance at court, 586; turned over to military authorities, 2,271; committed to the workhouse, 1,223; entered into bond to keep the peace, 710; punished by fine, 8,743; other punishment of a light nature, 343; dismissed, 7,757; cases, of which final disposition was not reported, 902. The fines imposed amount in the aggregate to $33,197 50. The police force during the same time has furnished lodgings to 2,483 destitute persons found in the streets and highways, restored 102 lost children, and assisted to carry 170 disabled persons to hospitals, besides taking up estrays, giving fire alarms, and attending to many other similar duties. A detective corps and a sanitary company have been in successful operation. During the year a fire-alarm and police telegraph has been erected. This will prove to be of very great value in rendering the police force more effective, and in insuring the safety of property against the ravages of fire and the dangers of riot. It is believed that after this telegraph has been used for a few months, and the members of the police have become familiar with the very many uses to which it may be applied, the necessity of an increase in the number of policemen will not be felt as heretofore. I respectfully recommend that an appropriation be made by Congress to meet the expense incurred.

The warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, appointed by authority of the act of Congress, approved February 29, 1864, entered upon his duties on the 11th of April last. The average number of prisoners since that time has been about one hundred, though occasionally much greater. The jail has become dilapidated and insecure, and a new and more spacious one should be erected. This recommendation has been submitted by my predecessors for several years past, and at one time the Senate called upon this Department to furnish a plan and estimate for this object. Congress, however, has never authorized the erection of such a building. The necessity for it increases with the increase of population and of transient sojourners in Washington, and is undeniably much greater to-day than heretofore. I have considered carefully the suggestion of the warden, that ample means for the construction of such a building might be obtained by the sale of the vacant square on which the jail now stands. This square, so near to the Capitol and Smithsonian grounds, will not be necessary for beautifying the city, or for affording it ample ventilation. According to an estimate which has been submitted to me, it contains four hundred and thirty-five thousand two hundred and eighty-six square feet of ground, which, if laid off into lots and sold, would at present prices command a large sum. The new jail might be located upon the square on which the City Hall stands, in the rear of that building. If erected after the most approved modern plan, it would not prove detrimental to private property, while the erection of dwellings or buildings for business purposes, upon the square which it is proposed to sell, would tend greatly to enhance the value of private property in the vicinity. The warden of the jail, and the grand jury that served at the June term of the court, as well as the police commissioners, have called attention to the large number of juvenile offenders in the District, and to the great impropriety of incarcerating them with veterans in crime. Youths so treated are often discharged from jail more depraved than when they entered it. The recommendation made last year in favor of the erection of a house of correction for such offenders is respectfully renewed. It should be so regulated as to combine punishment with means of instruction and reform. The necessity for the erection of a penitentiary in this District was fully set forth in the last annual report of this Department. Additional force cannot be given to the recommendation then made by a repetition of the views therein presented.

The clerical force engaged in the compilation of the statistics of the census becomes gradually less with the progress of the work devolving upon it, and its duties should be completed at an early period. The volume on population has been printed and distributed, and meets with favor throughout the country. That on agriculture is nearly ready for distribution, and the subsequent volumes will appear in succession; the whole presenting a complete exhibit of the material interests and progress of the country up to the period of the rebellion.

The numerous demands of States, Departments, members of Congress, and individuals for statistical information, illustrate the importance of the organization of a permanent bureau of statistics, heretofore recommended to Congress. The maintenance of such a bureau, charged, among other duties, with that of compiling the census returns and superintending the publication thereof, will not, it is believed, be attended with any additional expense to the Government.

The building occupied by the United States for the use of its courts in the city of New York is held under an expired lease. Notice has been given by the lessors that it is their intention to sell the premises as soon as the fair value can be obtained therefor. The attention of Congress to this subject is earnestly solicited, and an appropriation is recommended adequate to the purchase of a building adapted to the service.

The enforcement of the measures adopted by Congress for the suppression of the African slave trade has been attended by the most auspicious results. It is believed that in no port of the United States has a vessel been fitted out to engage in that nefarious traffic. Several prizes have been taken before the mixed courts of justice sitting at Sierra Leone and the Cape of Good Hope, but the result has not yet been communicated to the Department.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. P. USHER, Secretary.
To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 6, 1864.

In presenting to Congress his annual report on the state of the finances, in obedience to the requirements of law, the Secretary of the Treasury feels that, while there is no occasion to distrust the ability of the people of the United States to bear the great and increasing burdens imposed upon them by the arduous and prolonged struggle for national existence in which they are engaged, there is, nevertheless, much in the financial condition of the Government which requires careful and anxious consideration. Among the serious duties devolved upon him, the Secretary recognizes a full and clear exposition of that condition as first in importance, in order that the wisdom of Congress may provide a remedy for existing evils, and guard against the recurrence of similar evils in the future.

The Secretary's assumption of office was so nearly coincident with the commencement of the present fiscal year that he would be naturally impelled to begin by stating the exact condition of the Treasury upon that day. Before proceeding to do so, however, a brief review of the financial measures adopted since the outbreak of the rebellion, and of their operation and effect, may not be without value in endeavoring to arrive at just conclusions with regard to the future.

On the 4th day of March, A. D. 1861, the national debt was, comparatively, so inconsiderable as hardly to deserve the name. Accustomed to a degree of prosperity before unexampled in the history of nations, the people of the United States had grown rich and powerful, without being conscious of national burdens, and equally unconscious of their own vast and increasing ability to sustain a weight which, could it have been anticipated, might have seemed altogether beyond their strength. Unaccustomed, for a long course of years, to great national efforts, it was fortunate that their power of endurance should be tested only by degrees, as the struggle which Providence had prepared for them developed its vast proportions, and the necessity of great and long-continued effort became apparent. Had it been then foreseen that what was believed to be a contest for months was to be continued for years, and that hundreds of millions of public debt would be swollen into thousands of millions before the close of that contest, it may well be doubted whether, ignorant as they were of their own immense resources, the people might not have shrunk appalled from an undertaking which contemplated sacrifices so far exceeding all former experience.

In his first report to Congress, made on the 4th day of July, 1861, my predecessor estimated the whole amount required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1862, at $318,519,581 87. To meet this anticipated expenditure, Congress, by an act approved July 17, 1861, authorized a loan of $270,000,000, which, with the ordinary revenues, was considered an ample provision for the exigencies of the year. By an act approved August 5, 1861, Congress further authorized a direct tax of $20,000,000, and a tax of three per cent. on the excess of all incomes over $800 per annum. It was not anticipated, however, that any revenue, derived from the last-mentioned sources, would be available within the year.

Experience proved that the estimate of the Secretary, though founded on what seemed to be reliable data, was altogether inadequate; and in his report of December 9, 1861, he was compelled to ask Congress to provide for a probable deficiency of $213,904,427 62. In the same report he estimated the expenditures of the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1862, at $475,331,245 51.

On the 30th of December, 1861, and soon afterwards, most of the State banks suspended specie payments.

In view of this condition of affairs, and of the large appropriations called for to meet the public wants, Congress passed various laws, which need only be alluded to. It had become manifest that, while much the largest portion of the amount required must be provided by loans in some form, resort must be had to a wider and more stringent taxation in order to preserve the credit of the Government. Accordingly, the act of July 1, 1862, called the internal revenue law, was passed, providing for a levy of duties on various domestic manufactures, upon trades and occupations, and also providing a system of stamp, income, and other duties. This important measure, it was hoped, would, in connection with the duties on imports, and the sums derived from other sources, furnish such a proportion of the revenue needed as would place the national credit upon a stable foundation, through the evidence thus afforded of a readiness to impose on the present a reasonable share of public burdens, leaving to the future no more than in justice it ought to bear. If these hopes were not realized, the disappointment was, perhaps, imputable, in a great degree, to the facts that the system adopted was one to which the people had not been accustomed, that the machinery was complicated, the officers who were to execute it inexperienced, and that sufficient allowance was not made for the important element of time, which alone can give to any such system the requisite efficiency.

With a like view to increase the revenue, and to sustain our own industry under the burden imposed by the internal revenue law, Congress, by an act approved July 14, 1862, largely increased the duties on imports. It was justly believed that these measures could hardly fail to inspire confidence in the ability and purpose of the nation to meet all its obligations in the present and the future.

The necessities of the Treasury were, however, immediate. To raise money in large amounts by taxation, and even by loans, requires more time than can always be afforded with large armies in the field and great navies afloat. The demands of war are imperative, and cannot await the slow process of financial negotiations. To meet a demand thus urgent, Congress, by acts of February 25 and July 11, 1862, saw fit to authorize the emission of United States notes to the amount, including $60,000,000 of Treasury notes previously authorized, which were to be redeemed and canceled, of $300,000,000, as a substitute for coin, declaring them a legal tender for debts, public and private, and clothing them with all the requisites of currency. These notes were convertible, at the will of the holder, into bonds of the United States, paying interest at six per cent., semi-annually, in coin, to secure which the revenue from customs, also payable in coin, was specifically pledged. The same act of February 25, 1862, authorized the issue of bonds to the amount of $500,000,000, increased subsequently to $511,000,000, redeemable after five years, and payable in twenty years from date.

Notwithstanding the ample provision supposed to be made by Congress for the expenditures of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1863, the report of the Secretary, submitted on the 4th of December, 1862, showed a deficiency for the current year of $276,912,517 66; while the estimated amount of expenditures over receipts from ordinary sources for the succeeding year was $622,388,186 56. To provide for the aggregate of these amounts, Congress, by an act approved March 3, 1863, authorized the loan of $300,000,000 for the then current, and of $600,000,000 for the then next fiscal year. By the second section of the same act the Secretary was authorized to issue, as a part of said loan, $400,000,000 in amount of Treasury notes, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent. per annum, payable in lawful money, which notes, payable at periods expressed on their face, might be made a legal tender at their face value. By the third section $150,000,000 in amount of United States notes, of a like character with those previously issued under the provisions of former acts, were authorized as a part of said loan.

It will be seen that by the several acts of Congress referred to, Government paper, as a substitute for coin, under the respective designations of United States notes and Treasury notes, might be issued to the amount of $850,000,000, namely: United States notes, not bearing interest, to the amount of $450,000,000, but of which $50,000,000 were to be held in reserve for the redemption of temporary deposits, and to be replaced as soon as possible, thus leaving the whole amount intended for circulation but $400,000,000; and $400,000,000 of Treasury notes, bearing interest, and which it was hoped and believed would not remain in circulation, as they could be made a legal tender only for their face value, without interest.

In the preceding enumeration of the several acts passed by Congress with a view to provide the large means required to meet annual expenditures to a period including the fiscal year 1864, no reference has been made to several auxiliary measures, designed to meet the exigencies of the hour, but neither enlarging nor diminishing the amount required, and serving no other purpose than a mere temporary resource. Of such was the act of March 1, 1862, authorizing the issue of certificates of indebtedness, payable one year or less after date, with six per cent. interest, and the several acts authorizing the Secretary to receive deposits at the Treasury for a period not less than thirty days, to be repaid at ten days' notice. Of a somewhat similar character, from its necessarily limited amount, is the fractional currency authorized by the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1863.

The object of the Secretary in calling attention to these various acts of Congress in connection with the estimates of his predecessor is to show—

First. The utter impossibility, in times like the present, of ascertaining with any degree of certainty prospective demands upon the Treasury. Estimates, apparently on the most liberal scale, may be, as they have been, found inadequate. Hence arise large deficiencies, occasioned by an unexpected increase of military force in the first place, and upon a rise of prices for material invariably consequent upon military operations conducted upon a gigantic scale, even if the currency could be maintained in a sound and natural condition.

Second. The difficulty of fixing upon any policy not subject to the contingencies of the hour. It is, in the Secretary's judgment, not only difficult but impossible to apply fixed rules to a condition of affairs constantly changing, or to meet contingencies which no human wisdom can foresee by a steady application of general laws, especially in a Government, and with a people, where public opinion is the controlling element, and that opinion is not under the direction of those who may happen to administer public affairs. Accordingly it has been seen that the attempt to conduct financial operations, on so immense a scale, upon a strict specie basis soon proved impracticable.

Resort to some other species of currency of a national character became unavoidable, as was unanswerably demonstrated by my predecessor in his report of December, 1862. Fraught with danger as Government paper has almost invariably proved, there was, under the circumstances, no other resource. Of course, the danger increases with enlarged demands upon the Treasury, growing out of increased expenditures, a rise of prices occasioned by an increase of taxation on articles of consumption, the withdrawal of labor from productive pursuits, accompanied by an aggravated demand for products and material incident to a state of war. The problem to be solved is how to mitigate the evil, if it cannot be wholly avoided. If loans can be negotiated at reasonable rates, and the Treasury can be thus kept in a condition to meet current demands, it is not difficult to restrain the circulation of Government paper within safe limits. But this, not always certain in a time of peace, though with abundant resources it always should be, is often impossible when war upon a large scale, and long continued, has created distrust. Hence it has followed that, under the acts referred to, our bonds have assumed various forms, to suit what was supposed to be the choice of lenders. Our notes have shown a similar diversity of character, while it has been found impossible to avoid the necessity of using them to an extent which could not but aggravate the troubles incident to the necessities of our condition.

Yet, though forced to resort to the issue of paper for the time, the idea of a specie basis was not lost sight of, as the payment of interest on long loans in coin was amply secured. And though in several of the acts authorizing the issue of bonds at long periods payment of the principal at maturity in coin is not specifically provided, the omission, it is believed, was accidental, as there could have been no intention to make a distinction between the different classes of securities in this regard. It is respectfully recommended to remove all doubt upon this point by proper legislation.

Although the wisdom of thus securing the payment of interest on bonds in coin has been questioned, and the pledge of the receipts from customs, to be collected in coin for that purpose, has perhaps facilitated the operations of those disposed to enhance the price of gold for speculative purposes, the Secretary is of the opinion that these measures were not only wise but necessary at the time, and greatly aided in sustaining public credit.

The expenditures for the preceding fiscal year so slightly exceeded the estimates of the Department, that at the last session of Congress it was not considered necessary to increase the amount authorized to be borrowed by existing laws. Experience had shown, however, that some changes of form were advisable. By an act approved March 3, 1864, authority was given to the Secretary to issue bonds to the amount of $200,000,000 in lieu of so much of the loan authorized by act of March 3, 1863, redeemable after any period not less than five years, and payable not more than forty years from date. At a subsequent period of the session, June 30, 1864, the authority conferred by the first section of the act of March 3, 1863, was repealed, except so far as it affected an amount of $75,000,000 then advertised, and power was given to borrow $400,000,000 on bonds redeemable after five years, and payable not more than forty years from date. By the second section of the same act authority was conferred to issue, in lieu of the same amount of bonds, $200,000,000 in Treasury notes, which might be made a legal tender at their face value, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding seven and three tenths per cent., payable in lawful money, and convertible, at the pleasure of the Secretary, into bonds issued under the authority of said act. The Secretary was further empowered to substitute for Treasury notes issued under former acts an equal amount of notes such as were therein authorized.

A table is appended to this report, showing the amounts issued under the several acts hereinbefore referred to, to the beginning of the present fiscal year, from which it appears that, by the laws in force on that day, the Secretary had authority to borrow, on the credit of the United States, the amounts following, namely:

1. Under the act of March 3, 1863, so much of $75,000,000 advertised previously to June 30, 1864, as had not been awarded to bidders.....	$33,459,700 00
2. Under the act of March 3, 1864, so much as had not been subscribed for, and paid into the Treasury, namely.....	127,693,530 00
3. Under the act of June 30, 1864.....	400,000,000 00
4. Amount of Treasury notes issued under former acts, which had been redeemed and canceled, and which the Secretary was authorized to replace by notes issued under the act of June 30, 1864....	62,191,400 00

The very large comparative receipts from miscellaneous sources require explanation. They are accounted for as follows:

From captured and abandoned property.....	$2,146,715 09
Premium on gold shipped from San Francisco to London.....	2,799,920 64
Sales of prizes and due to captors.....	4,088,111 42

Commutation money.....	12,451,896 15
All other sources.....	3,716,542 11
Total.....	$47,511,448 10

The Secretary is of the opinion that not over $25,000,000 can be safely calculated upon as likely to accrue from similar sources during the current year.

The item of "premium on gold shipped from San Francisco to London," may also require further explanation. In March, 1863, it became necessary to transmit a considerable amount of funds to London, for a special purpose, for which an appropriation had been made by Congress, and it was thought advisable to deposit a certain amount of our securities with an eminent London banker, against which bills might be drawn. Five-twenty bonds to the amount of $10,000,000 were accordingly placed in the hands of two distinguished citizens, to whose care the negotiation was committed. The negotiation failed, and $6,000,000 of the $10,000,000 were returned to the Treasury and disposed of. It was thought advisable that the amount of $4,000,000 should remain, and that exchange should be drawn against it, and the bonds disposed of abroad, if a favorable market should be found. It appears, however, that very nearly this amount of issue is in excess of the $511,000,000 authorized by existing laws, $510,756,900 having been disposed of. The act of June 30, 1864, authorizes the Secretary to dispose of "any bonds known as five-twenties remaining unsold." It is at least questionable whether by this clause power is conferred to dispose of an amount beyond that fixed by existing laws. Additional legislation may remove that doubt, should Congress think it advisable, otherwise they may be canceled.

Exchange having been drawn, it became necessary to provide funds to meet the bills at maturity, which was accomplished by shipments of gold from California.

The expenditures for the current fiscal year were estimated in the last report of the Secretary as follows:

Estimated balance of former appropriations.....	$350,000,000 00
For the civil service.....	27,973,194 81
For pensions and Indians.....	9,631,304 73
For the War Department.....	536,204,127 77
For the Navy Department.....	142,618,785 40
For interest on the public debt.....	85,337,677 15

Leaving to be provided for.....	751,815,089 86
And the receipts from ordinary sources were estimated in the aggregate at.....	206,836,539 93

Leaving to be provided by loans.....	$544,978,549 93
--------------------------------------	------------------

This estimate, like all others of a similar character, was necessarily based on past experience with regard to unexpended balances, and upon estimates from the different Departments, which, in a time of war, must be liable to great uncertainty. Additional information enables me to state the probable expenditures with a nearer approach to accuracy. As corrected by including so much of the actual balance of former appropriations as is liable to be used during the year, those made at the last session of Congress, the additional amounts called for to meet probable deficiencies, and reducing the balance of unexpended appropriation at the end of the year, as from amounts expended during the first quarter would seem necessary, the estimate is as follows:

Actual unexpended balance as above.....	$580,387,050 23
For the War Department.....	625,945,741 65
For the Navy Department.....	110,647,459 96
For the civil service.....	21,785,372 50
For pensions and Indians.....	6,590,082 12
Indefinite appropriations.....	9,152,007 11
For interest on public debt.....	91,810,215 18
Amount.....	1,245,729,135 75

Add public debt matured and maturing during the year, namely:

Certificates of indebtedness.....	160,720,000 00
Texas debt.....	2,149,000 00
Loan of 1842.....	196,808 45
Treasury notes under act of March 2, 1861, and prior thereto.....	278,511 64
Total.....	$1,409,662,455 84

The amount of certificates outstanding on the 1st of November, 1864, was $238,593,000. This being a much larger amount than the market ought to bear, it would not be wise to calculate upon these securities as available for the service of the

From lands.....	642,185 84
From internal revenue.....	249,562,859 92
From miscellaneous sources.....	24,020,171 44

Leaving as increase of the public debt at the close of the year*..... $482,374,188 02

Stated in the usual form by taking the actual receipts and expenditures of the first quarter as a distinct basis of calculation, the result is the same, namely:

For the first quarter of the current year, ending September 30, 1864, the actual receipts, as shown by the books of the Treasury, were as follows:

From customs.....	$19,271,091 96
From lands.....	342,185 84
From direct tax.....	16,079 86
From internal revenue.....	46,562,859 92
From miscellaneous sources.....	9,020,171 44

Add actual balance in the Treasury July 1, 1864..... 18,842,558 71

Receipts from all sources excepting loans, 94,054,947 73

For the three remaining quarters, ending on the 30th of June, 1865, the estimate is:

From customs.....	$51,000,000 00
From internal revenue.....	203,000,000 00
From lands.....	300,000 00
From miscellaneous sources.....	15,000,000 00
	269,300,000 00

Total receipts from ordinary sources, actual and estimated, with balance on hand July 1, 1864..... $363,354,947 73

The expenditures for the first quarter, ending September 30, 1864, were as follows, namely:

For civil service.....	$8,712,432 51
For pensions and Indians.....	4,935,179 31
For War Department.....	286,200,288 52

For interest on public debt.....	19,921,054 48

Total, exclusive of principal of public debt, 353,061,861 31

For the three remaining quarters the estimated expenditures, based upon appropriations and estimated deficiencies, are:

For the civil service.....	$26,852,489 47
For pensions and Indians.....	6,516,595 72
For War Department.....	677,479,384 39

* In addition to the liabilities before stated, it may be mentioned that the 7.30 notes, so called, the issue of 1861, and the one-year five per cent. legal tenders, amounting to $43,585,000, also become payable during the current year. The conversion of the former being provided for, however, by the act of August 5, 1861, and the latter by a power of substitution under the act of June 30, 1864, they have been excluded from this estimate. The amount of 7.30 notes redeemed in money to November 1, 1864, is only $63,500, charged to current expenditures; while the whole amount converted to that date is $125,864,900.

The public debt, matured and maturing, during the year, is, as before stated..... $163,353,320 09

subject to such increase as may be occasioned should Congress not provide for additional revenue, or should the income from ordinary sources fall short of the estimates submitted.

Any estimate which may be made of the probable receipts and expenditures for the next fiscal year must necessarily be liable to still greater uncertainty. This remark applies more particularly to expenditures. For while, if existing laws remain unchanged, the amount of revenue may be calculated with reasonable certainty, it is impossible to anticipate what the exigencies of war may require. On the one hand this may call for increased effort, and on the other it may be confidently hoped that the great struggle is near its termination, and that, consequently, the estimate now submitted will prove far beyond the wants of the year. While any doubt remains, however, it would be unsafe to assume any other basis of calculation than one predicated upon the existing state of affairs.

The receipts for the year ending June 30, 1866, are estimated as follows:

From customs.....	$70,000,000 00
From internal duties.....	300,000,000 00
From lands.....	1,000,000 00
From miscellaneous sources.....	25,000,000 00
Aggregate.....	$396,000,000 00

The expenditures are estimated as follows:

Balance of unexpended appropriations..	$350,000,000 00
For the civil service.....	33,082,497 24
For pensions and Indians.....	14,196,050 64
For the War Department.....	531,758,191 11
For the Navy Department.....	112,219,665 18
For interest on the public debt.....	127,000,000 00

Aggregate..... 1,168,256,005 17

But from this aggregate there may be deducted, as likely to remain unexpended at the close of the year..... 350,000,000 00

Total..... 818,256,005 17

Deduct estimated receipts from ordinary sources..... 396,000,000 00

There will remain to be provided for by loans..... 422,256,005 17

To this should be added, for redemption of excess of certificates of indebtedness, 47,365,000 00

Making the whole amount to be provided for by loans..... $469,621,005 17

Assuming the correctness of these estimates, the whole debt on July 1, 1866, would be found by adding the foregoing amount of $422,256,005 17 to the estimated debt on July 1, 1865, $2,223,064,677 51, giving $2,645,320,682 68 as the amount of the debt at the close of the next fiscal year. This calculation is made on the same basis of receipts as that assumed for the current year. It is quite probable, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that $300,000,000 may be received in another year from that source, without the additional legislation suggested by him. Should this supposition be verified, and the new taxes proposed for this year be laid and continued, an additional $50,000,000 might be expected from internal revenue. The Secretary has, however, thought it wiser to name $300,000,000 as all that would probably be realized.

It will be observed that the actual receipts from ordinary sources, for the last fiscal year, varied materially from the estimates, particularly from customs and internal revenue. This variation is imputable, in great part, to the legislation of Congress at its last session, increasing largely the rates of duty on foreign and domestic articles. It is apprehended, however, that similar results will not follow for the residue of the present year in both these particulars. The increase of duties on imports, under the act of June 30, 1864, has already had the effect to decrease importations to a considerable extent, and the same effect will be likely to continue; so that, estimating the receipts of the three remaining quarters by those of the first, in the light of former experience, it will not be safe to calculate upon revenue from customs much exceeding $70,000,000 for the current year.

In the judgment of the Secretary, this disadvantage, in a financial point of view, is more than counterbalanced by the stimulus afforded to domestic industry, and the consequent increased revenue from that source.

From internal revenue a different and far more favorable result may be anticipated. It will be noticed that, instead of $77,599,703 59, there was received from this source in the past year $108,260,320 59, under substantially the same law which, in ten months of the preceding year, yielded only $37,640,787 95.

The new law which went into operation on the 1st of July last, largely increasing these duties, although it will probably fail to produce the amount of revenue hoped for, may, if not materially changed, together with the special income tax imposed by the joint resolution of July 2, 1864, be safely estimated to produce the sum of $250,000,000, should the business of the country be ordinarily prosperous. The same causes which, under preceding laws, produced so large an increase in the second year, would be likely to have a similar effect, to some extent, under the new, so that at least the amount of $250,000,000 may be expected from it in another year without the aid of a special income tax.

But this amount is not and ought not to be satisfactory. Three hundred millions, at least, should be realized from internal duties. It is for Congress to select the sources and devise the modes in which this most desirable result can be attained, and the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is referred to for his views on this important point, as well as for many valuable suggestions having reference to the same general subject.

The Secretary will venture, with great deference, to remark that, in his judgment, a commission, properly constituted, for the purpose of inquiring as to profitable sources of revenue, and devising improvements in the modes of its collection, might, in a country of such varied production, and among a people of such diverse industrial pursuits, elicit much information which would materially assist the deliberations of Congress, and lighten its labors, upon a subject so new to legislative experience on this continent. As, however, a resolution pointing to this end did not meet the approval of Congress at its last session, the Secretary did not feel authorized to institute an inquiry through such instrumentality, and he has been unable to adopt other effective measures for the same purpose.

After much reflection, and a careful revision of his opinions heretofore expressed in another place, to which, under the circumstances, he may be pardoned for referring, the Secretary feels obliged to say that he sees no other resource for raising the additional revenue, so necessary to the national credit, than those pointed out by the Commissioner. He is aware of the great difficulties attending the collection of the duties proposed, and feels all the objections heretofore made to their imposition. He nevertheless believes that a tax on tobacco in the leaf, or unmanufactured, if it can be enforced, is the only mode by which the duty on that article can be collected fairly and equally, and through which an adequate amount of revenue can be obtained from it. He believes, also, that, although a tax on sales would probably fail of collection to some extent, yet, by applying to it stringent rules, requiring frequent periodical returns, verified by oath, coupled with the power to compel an exhibit of books of account, it might become a very large and important item of revenue. The Secretary would further suggest whether the income tax should not be collected upon all, without exemption. As the law is, it opens the door to innumerable frauds, and in a young and growing country the vast majority of incomes are small, while all participate alike in the blessings of good government. The adoption of a scale, augmenting the rate of taxation upon incomes as they rise in amount, though unequal in one sense, cannot be considered oppressive or unjust, inasmuch as the ability to pay increases in much more than arithmetical proportion as the amount of income exceeds the limit of reasonable necessity.

From the results of experience, as well as from all the information received, the Secretary is well convinced that much revenue fails to be collected through an imperfect execution of the law, and more through a fraudulent evasion of its provisions. Time and effort will, it is hoped, remedy these evils in a great degree, and the confident expectations of those who framed it be realized. In the mean time no effort should be spared to perfect it, as far as possible, and no experiment to increase its efficiency, of which there is a reasonable hope of success, should be left untied.

In connection with the subject of increased taxation, and the necessity of providing additional revenue from ordinary sources, the Secretary cannot but call the attention of Congress to our public domain, and more especially to that portion of it abounding in the precious and other metals which, by the policy of the Government, has been reserved to the nation. He can add little, however, on these points, to what has been heretofore so ably set forth by his predecessor. The agricultural region has, through the operation of the homestead law, almost ceased to afford a direct revenue. Whatever might be the opinions of the Secretary as to the good effects of this law, either in a State or national point of view, it is not probable that any expression of those opinions would tend to effect any material change or modification. Possibly, had the struggle in which the nation is now engaged been foreseen, or even apprehended, Congress might have deemed it prudent not to adopt a system which renders so large a portion of the public domain unavailable as a basis of credit, either by way of pledge of its proceeds, or an appropriation of those proceeds, permanently, to the creation of a sinking fund for the ultimate redemption of the public debt. In either aspect that domain might have been made to render material aid. But it may still fairly be questioned whether, and to what extent, such aid has not been afforded by the inducements offered to an immigration which is daily augmenting the resources and power of the Republic. With regard to the mineral lands, the question is freed from this embarrassment. These are still the property of the nation, and may be disposed of as Congress shall determine. That they should yield a revenue to the owner, independent of all the collateral advantages derived from individual enterprise in extracting the precious metals, would seem to admit of no dispute. On the one hand it may be said that to sell them absolutely is to part with an unequalled and inexhaustible source of wealth and power, the control of which should always remain in the hands of the Government; on the other, that all attempts, hitherto, to realize any considerable amount of revenue from any system of rents have proved unsuccessful. It is to be hoped that Congress may be able to devise some mode by which these lands may be made available, to an extent in some just measure proportionate to their yearly production. The question is one involving a knowledge of the subject which the Secretary does not now possess, and requiring an amount of study and reflection which, thus far, he has been unable to bestow. The attention of Congress is invited to a paper on this subject, prepared by direction of the Secretary, which accompanies this report, and will repay an attentive perusal.

The act of February 25, 1862, provides that the coin received for duties on imports shall, after paying interest on bonds and notes, be appropriated to the purchase of one per cent. of the public debt, to be set apart, with its accruing interest, as a sinking fund, as the Secretary might from time to time direct. All experience has proved that in time of war, when expenditures must largely exceed receipts from ordinary sources, and large sums are borrowed in each year, the attempt to establish a sinking fund invariably fails. It is, in fact, simply borrowing to lend again. For this reason no attempt to carry out this provision has yet been made. As the time is approaching, however, when the present unnatural condition of affairs may be expected to terminate, it is well to consider whether some legislation postponing for a time the operation of the provision referred to, and designating a board of officers as commissioners of the sinking fund, under proper regulations, may not be advisable; their duties to commence at such time as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate. Such legislation would at least show that the provision for a sinking fund is not intended to remain a dead letter upon the statute-book when peace shall return, and with it the power to render that provision effective. Should any further aid be necessary the Secretary would respectfully suggest whether such income as may be received from the public domain, from sales, or in the shape of rents or royalty, may not be beneficially appropriated to the same purpose.

From preceding statements it appears that exclusive of the receipts from ordinary sources the amounts following are to be provided:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865.....	$570,727,508 11
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.....	469,621,005 17

Deduct amount now authorized, and balance in the Treasury July 1, 1864.....	560,063,188 02
---	----------------

It leaves a balance to be provided for by additional legislation of.....	$480,285,325 26
--	------------------

It will be observed that this balance is predicated upon contingencies which may not occur, and calculations which may prove deceptive. It would be unsafe, therefore, to limit so closely the provision to be made by Congress for meeting the expenditures of this and the succeeding years.

To raise a large portion of the amount necessary to meet these anticipated expenditures, it is obvious that recourse was to be had to loans; which have been already, in part, negotiated. The necessities of former years have led to many expedients, as is apparent from the diversity of forms which our securities present. As the debt increases, from year to year, borrowing becomes more difficult. Embarrassed as the country is with two systems of banking, and obstructed as the Government is by a currency wholly beyond its control, it is manifest that to push its own circulation far, if at all, beyond its present limit, could only be justified by absolute necessity. To thrust our securities upon the market in such amounts as it is not able to bear, and to retain no check upon stockjobbing combinations, must exercise a disastrous effect upon public credit, and operate injuriously upon large numbers who have heretofore invested their means, liberally and confidently, in Government issues.

The Secretary is not unmindful that, in the opinion of many persons conversant with financial matters, recourse should be had to foreign markets; and in two acts of Congress, one of which is still in force, authority has been given to negotiate a foreign loan. This, if practicable at all, on terms which the Secretary could feel justified in accepting, would, in his opinion, at the present time and under existing laws, be so inconsiderable in amount, that its effects would be merely temporary, and would afford an alleviation rather than a relief. Our bonds have already, to a considerable amount, been sought for abroad, and to that extent the home market has been relieved and strengthened. Communication with Europe is now so easy and regular, intelligence is transmitted so rapidly, business facilities are so abundant, that foreign markets are almost at our own doors, and a demand abroad is felt almost at the moment, and supplied without injurious delay. To effect a foreign loan would not, as it has seemed to the Secretary, add much, if at all, to the whole amount of sales, unless stimulated by efforts and inducements which our financial condition has not, as yet, called for. And, although a certain advantage might be gained in the power to control, in some degree, the rate of foreign exchange, by the deposit of a large sum to be drawn against as occasion might require, the possible benefit thence to be derived has not seemed sufficient to counterbalance other and opposing considerations.

This nation has been able, thus far, to conduct a domestic war of unparalleled magnitude and cost without appealing for aid to any foreign people. It has chosen to demonstrate its power to put down insurrection by its own strength and furnish no pretense for doubt of its entire ability to do so, either to domestic or foreign foes. The people of the United States have felt a just pride in this position before the world. In the judgment of the Secretary, it may well be doubted whether the national credit abroad has not been strengthened and sustained by the fact that foreign investments in our securities have not been sought by us, and whether we have not found a pecuniary advantage in self-reliance.

But, however this may be, it seemed to the Secretary that, even if inclined to attempt the negotiation of a foreign loan, the time was unpropitious, and the difficulty attending such a negotiation, while exchange was subject to rapid and violent fluctuation, upon any safe terms, appeared almost insurmountable. Whatever risk was to be incurred must necessarily fall upon the Government. He thought it wiser, therefore, to wait until events should have more fully demonstrated the inevitably favorable result of the contest in which the nation is engaged—which time he believes to be near at hand—rather than venture upon an experiment which, if successful, could afford but temporary relief, and a failure in which might be attended with evils of a very serious character. Believing that the country can, if it will, sustain, for a long time to come, any burden which the war is likely to impose, the Secretary has deferred an undertaking which seemed to him so doubtful of success, and so questionable in its results. It may be added to these considerations that, to have the interest on our public debt payable at home, and to our own rather than to a foreign people, are advantages the value and importance of which can hardly be too highly estimated.

The whole amount of national circulation, not bearing interest, exclusive of fractional currency, and of notes issued by national banks, is limited to $400,000,000, subject to slight occasional increase from the $50,000,000 held in reserve for the payment of temporary deposits. Of five per cent. interest-bearing notes there were outstanding, on the 1st of November last, $120,519,110. To a considerable extent these notes have been, and will continue to be, used as currency. Those with coupons have been found particularly objectionable, as, though withdrawn to a certain extent while the interest is maturing, they are liable to be periodically rushed upon the market. In consideration of this feature, a large amount, namely, about $90,000,000 of the original issue of $150,000,000 of these coupon notes, have been withdrawn and destroyed, and their place occupied by notes payable in three years, bearing interest at six per cent., compounded semi-annually. This is believed to be the best form of interest-bearing legal-tender notes, as being more likely to be withdrawn and held until maturity as an investment. Of these, $15,000,000 in amount were issued under the act of March 3, 1863, and about $90,000,000 under the act of June 30, 1864. The total amount of interest-bearing notes outstanding on the 22d of November last was $210,222,870. What proportion of these may be considered as an addition to the circulation, I am unable to determine. To that extent, whatever it may be, they contribute to the amount of currency, and thus in some degree occasion, and in still greater degree sustain, an increase of prices, and depress values.

The amount of bills issued to the national banks, as appears from the books of the Comptroller of the Currency, was, up to the 22d of November inclusive, $65,160,210. As these banks have absorbed capital which might otherwise have been invested in State corporate institutions, and in many instances have taken the place of those institutions, by conversion, their issues cannot be regarded as so much addition to the body of currency. The returns on file at the Department show that the whole circulation of the State banks on the 1st of January, 1864, was $169,926,129, while the whole circulation of such banks for the month of July, 1864, returned to the Internal Revenue Bureau, and which embraced, with a few trifling exceptions, all of these institutions outside of the rebellious States, was only $126,196,606 72. The diminution is $43,729,522 28, which, deducted from $65,160,210, leaves $21,436,687 72 as the amount of increase to November 22, 1864, on the supposition that the circulation of State banks has not been enlarged since July.

The subsequent returns, though incomplete, would tend rather to show a diminution since that date. Arguing from the fact that the notes of State banks have almost ceased to be current in some of the northwestern States, it may well be doubted whether, under the limitations of the law authorizing national banks, the establishment of these institutions has not had the effect rather to limit than to enlarge the whole amount of circulation.

It is observable that, notwithstanding the apparently large circulation of paper money issued under the authority of the various acts of Congress before enumerated, its scarcity in the market has occasioned no slight embarrassment in the negotiation of loans. This can be accounted for only upon the supposition that large amounts are carefully held by the people, thereby exhibiting their confidence in its character and value, and that the impetus given to trade of every description by the large and increasing wants of Government requires a largely increased amount of the circulating medium. A rise of prices tends, proportionately, in the same direction.

Believing, however, that, with the large addition made to the volume of currency by State banks through their various forms of credit, the whole amount far exceeded the limit of necessity, it was with extreme reluctance that the Secretary felt himself compelled to replace the five per cent. coupon notes, which had been withdrawn, by an issue of six per cent. compound-interest notes under the act of June 30, 1864, and even to exceed that amount to a small extent. But the necessities of the hour left him no choice. And he will now proceed to state the condition of financial affairs which, in his judgment, rendered such action imperative.

On assuming office, upon the 5th day of July last, the Secretary found his condition peculiarly embarrassing. The cash balance in the Treasury was, on the 1st of July, as before stated, $18,842,558 71. The unpaid requisitions on the 5th were $71,814,000. The amount of certificates of indebtedness outstanding was $161,796,000. The daily expenditures could not be calculated at less than $2,250,000. The larger portion of unpaid requisitions was for pay to the Army, and the Secretary was obliged to look forward to an increase, from the same quarter, of over $50,000,000 on the 1st of September. Thus situated, he could not avoid scrutinizing with some anxiety his probable means of meeting these most pressing claims upon the Treasury, and also of providing for the additional daily expenditures. He could look nowhere but to the receipts from ordinary sources, and to the power to borrow money under existing laws. From customs he could expect no substantial aid, and the returns for the first quarter of the current year will show that, beyond the revenue pledged to pay the interest upon bonds issued and to be issued during the year, comparatively little assistance could be derived from this source. With regard to internal revenue the Secretary felt more encouraged. Congress had wisely provided for a large increase of internal duties, by a law which went into operation on the 1st day of July. Under former laws the amount received had been steadily increasing during the three preceding months, and in the month of June had reached very nearly to $15,000,000. The Secretary confidently hoped that for July and the succeeding months it would reach, if it did not exceed, the daily average of $750,000. But this hope, if realized, would still leave him with a very large deficiency, to meet which, in part, he might issue certificates of indebtedness to public creditors. It was desirable, however, to avoid, could other means be found, increasing the amount of these securities. He might have recourse to the power conferred by the act of June 30, 1864, and put an additional $200,000,000 of legal-tender notes upon the market, and even increase that amount by some $60,000,000, in substitution for five per cents., issued under the act of March 3, 1863, which had been destroyed or were ready to be destroyed. Flushed as the money market was with circulation, sufficiently, at least, to meet the necessities of business, he was anxious, if possible, to avoid so doubtful an expedient.

The prospect of negotiating a loan in the ordinary way was by no means flattering, as the notice for a loan of $33,000,000, advertised on the 25th day of June, had been withdrawn on the 2d of July, the Secretary having reason to believe that such loan would not be taken on terms which it would be for the interest of the Government to accept.

Under these circumstances, the Secretary thought it advisable, in order to meet pressing emergencies, to borrow upon bonds or notes, authorized by the various acts referred to, $50,000,000 of the banks in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, and met the representatives of a large number of these institutions in New York for the purpose of effecting that object. The result proved, however, that, notwithstanding a professed, and, as the Secretary was convinced, a real desire to aid the Government, these institutions were not able to furnish the assistance required upon terms which, under existing provisions of law, the Secretary felt authorized to accept. He had then no other alternative than to issue legal-tender notes to a very large amount, or again to advertise for a loan; and he had no hesitation as to which course should be adopted. Accordingly, on the 25th of July he issued proposals for a national loan, under the act of June 30, 1864, upon notes payable in three years, with semi-annual interest at seven and three tenths per cent. per annum in lawful money. He incurred a considerable expense in advertising this loan, believing that it should be as widely diffused and as generally understood as possible, and offered liberal inducements to stimulate the efforts of corporations and individuals to dispose of the notes. His success, though not what he hoped for, or anticipated, has been such as not to diminish his confidence in the disposition and ability of the people to relieve the wants of their Government. A serious obstacle to greater success has been, the Secretary believes, the amount of other desirable national securities pressing upon the market, and presenting more favorable opportunities for investments.

Failing to raise the means required in the ordinary mode, and urged by the conviction that the large amount of suspended requisitions, swollen to more than $130,000,000, should be reduced, the Secretary resolved to use all the means at his command to pay so much, at least, as was due to our brave soldiers, who were suffering from the long delay in satisfying their just claims, but still continuing to serve their country with unflinching courage and uncomplaining devotion. To effect this object he was compelled to replace the whole amount of five per cent. notes which had been canceled, amounting to more than $80,000,000, and even slightly to exceed that sum. More fully to accomplish his purpose, the Secretary resolved to avail himself of a wish expressed by many officers and soldiers, through the paymasters, and offered to such as desired to receive them, seven-thirty notes, of small denominations. He was gratified to find that these notes were readily taken in payment to a large amount, our gallant soldiers, in many instances, not only receiving them with alacrity, but expressing their satisfaction at being able to aid their country by loaning money to the Government. The whole amount of notes thus disposed of exceeded $20,000,000, and the Secretary has great satisfaction in stating his belief that the disposal thus made was not only a relief to the Treasury, but proved a benefit to the recipients, in affording them a safe and valuable investment, and an easy mode of transmitting funds to their families.

To meet other pressing demands, the Secretary again offered to public competition bonds issued under the act of March 3, 1863, amounting to about $32,000,000. This offer was most favorably received, the bids reaching nearly $70,000,000, and the whole amount offered being taken at a premium of four per cent. and upward; the Treasury receiving, premiums included, the sum of $33,179,614 33.

Subsequently, on the 1st of October, the Secretary advertised for another loan of $40,000,000, upon five-twenty bonds, issued under the act of June 30, 1864. At the time of this offer the money market was in a feverish condition, arising from violent fluctuations in gold, and other causes, and serious doubts were entertained whether acceptable offers would be made. Under these circumstances, and with the hope of affecting favorably the market price of certificates of indebtedness which had become somewhat depressed by the large amount to which the issue had been necessarily increased, the Secretary decided to receive one fourth of the subscription in these securities. The result was, that, notwithstanding the anticipated failure of the loan, bids were received amounting to nearly $60,000,000, and the whole amount offered was taken at a rate above par, and averaging to the Government a fraction less than one per cent.

These negotiations have afforded satisfactory evidence, not only of the ability of the people to furnish, at a short notice, such sums as may be required, but of the entire confidence felt in the national securities. After nearly four years of a most expensive and wasting war, the means to continue it seem apparently undiminished, while the determination to prosecute it with vigor to the end is unabated.

In some particulars the Secretary has found himself embarrassed by the restrictive provisions of the act of July 2, 1864, and he will, therefore, at an early day, suggest such modifications as he considers necessary. In his judgment, a wide discretion should be intrusted to the officer charged with the duty of negotiating loans, in order that he may be enabled to avoid unexpected difficulties, occasioned by possible conditions of the money market. This delicate and responsible duty must necessarily be intrusted to somebody, and the people can have no other reliable security for faithfulness than may be found in the established character of the individual charged with so important a trust, whoever he may be. The discretion thus confided should, in the opinion of the Secretary, include the power of increasing the currency. To no individual would any considerable addition to the circulation, in any form, be more objectionable than to the present head of the Treasury Department, and no one would resort to such a measure, when the circulation was adequate to the wants of business, with more reluctance. Nor does he believe that a patriotic people, struggling for national existence, and possessed of ample means, would compel him to adopt a measure so fraught with injurious consequences as an issue of paper money beyond the limit so prescribed. The question, however, would be one for that people to decide. They have pronounced for a continuance of the war, until its great objects shall have been accomplished, in unmistakable terms. It is for them further to determine whether the necessary means shall be furnished by way of loan, and the circulation be restrained within safe limits, or whether they will prefer to endure the evils of exorbitant prices, with a loss of credit in the present, and a debt of needless magnitude entailed upon the future. Their financial officer can only submit to their decision, and act as the necessities of the occasion may demand. But the Secretary confidently believes that, judging from past events and recent demonstrations, there can be little question what the public voice will be upon a question so vital.

It is the province of Congress to indicate, and determine upon, the terms that may be offered to those who are invited to invest their means in Government securities; and it would seem both wise and prudent to make those terms sufficiently liberal. If our public debt must necessarily be large, and require a long course of years for its liquidation, its wide diffusion is most desirable. Such advantages should be offered as will induce all who have anything to spare beyond the amount required for their own support, or use, to invest that surplus, or a portion of it, in the national securities. These advantages can only be found in an increased rate of interest, an exemption from public burdens, and security of possession. What limit should be fixed, in either of these particulars, it is for the practical experience and wisdom of Congress to ascertain and determine.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The experience of the few past months cannot have failed to convince the most careless observer that, whatever may be the effect of a redundant circulation upon the price of coin, other causes have exercised a greater and more deleterious influence. In the course of a few days the price of this article rose from about $1 50 to $2 85 in paper for $1 00 in specie, and subsequently fell, in as short a period, to $1 87, and then again rose, as rapidly, to $2 50; and all without any assignable cause, traceable to an increase or decrease in the circulation of paper money, or an expansion or contraction of credit, or other similar influence on the market, tending to occasion a fluctuation so violent. It is quite apparent that the solution of the problem may be found in the unpatriotic and criminal efforts of speculators, and probably of secret enemies, to raise the price of coin, regardless of the injury inflicted upon the country, or desiring to inflict it. All such attempts should be indignantly frowned upon by a patriotic community, and the efforts of all good citizens invoked to counteract such nefarious schemes. A law, providing for the exemplary punishment of combinations for such a purpose might tend to vindicate, if it could not fully protect, the public rights in this regard, and should be, so far as possible, rigidly enforced.

But whatever success might attend any effort to check speculation in coin, or to counteract its injurious effect, it is still obvious that, so long as there remains a large and increasing necessity for its use, and a limited supply, it will command a price commensurate with the necessity and the difficulty of obtaining it. This necessity arises from the demand for foreign exchange, for customs duties, and to pay the interest on the public debt. The matter of foreign exchange I do not propose to discuss. The demand for duties on imports, and that to pay the interest on a large portion of the public debt, are so far identical that one is dependent upon the other. The laws authorizing the issue of bonds bearing interest in coin specifically pledged the revenue from customs to the payment of that interest, and provided for the collection of those duties in the same currency. In the opinion of the Secretary, that pledge should not be violated. A departure from it could only be vindicated by one of those state necessities which justify a nation in temporarily postponing its obligations in order to preserve the power to discharge them at a future day. When the pledge was given, no one anticipated a possible continuance of the war for such a length of time as would involve the increase of the public debt to the point it has already attained, or the possible payment of interest in coin to an amount beyond the ability of duties on imports to supply. It will be noticed, however, that our annual coin interest now exceeds $56,000,000. Should the additional amount required for the expenditures of the present fiscal year be raised upon bonds bearing interest in coin, and the revenue from customs not exceed the estimate predicated upon the receipts of the first quarter, it is quite manifest that resort must soon be had to some other source of supply, or recourse must be had to the emission of securities of a different character. It could not be expected that such securities would stand on a level with those the interest upon which is payable in coin, unless an increased value should be given them by a higher rate of interest, or their payment should be secured by a specific lien upon revenue.

In view of the serious considerations presented by this question, whether as affecting the market value of coin or the ability of Government to meet its specie interest, should the war continue, from the revenue now specifically appropriated to that purpose, the Secretary is forced to the conclusion that we should in the future rely, for the most part, upon securities bearing interest in currency, convertible into bonds, the interest of which is payable in coin. Notes bearing an increased rate of interest, payable in currency, redeemable in three or five years, and convertible at maturity into five-twenty bonds, would be preferable, in the judgment of the Secretary, to any other form of security. Bonds at long date, the interest of which is payable in currency at the usual rates, would be less attractive, and in the end involve a much greater sacrifice. The seven and three tenth notes authorized by the act of June 30, 1864, and now offered to the public, present as many advantages as any form of currency security, uniting a high rate of interest with convertibility. At the period of their maturity it may be confidently believed that the country will have been restored to a state of unity and peace, with all disturbing elements quieted, its population and resources increased and increasing, its strength confirmed, and with ample ability to meet all its obligations from its ordinary resources.

In the report of the Comptroller of the Currency will be found statements of the number of national banks organized since his last annual report, the States and Territories wherein organized, the amount of capital paid in, circulation, and bonds deposited. The statement exhibits a large and rapid increase, and demonstrates the popularity of the system. The rapid and extensive conversion of State institutions of established character, conducted through a long series of years by men of recognized financial ability, into banks organized under the new system, could not have taken place unless after full and careful consideration as to its safety and superior advantages. If it should be said that, perhaps, these advantages may be rather to those individually interested than to the community at large, the reply is that a single uniform currency, possessing the same value throughout the whole country, has been too long a general object of desire to have its importance questioned. If to this great and obvious good be added the benefits to Government, in its financial operations, of being freed from all the uncertainties and embarrassments arising from a currency over which it can exercise no control, the advantages of any system which will effect these objects can admit of no debate. The Secretary was not among the first to approve the plan adopted by Congress, and which seems to be receiving the popular sanction. Time and observation of its effects have, however, convinced him that the system, if not without defects, is based upon sound principles, and is entitled to all the benefit of a fair trial; and it is quite apparent that the good to be hoped cannot be fully realized so long as another system, at war with the great objects sought to be attained, shall continue to exist, unchecked and uncontrolled.

While, therefore, the Secretary would not advise the adoption of unfriendly or severe measures, likely to embarrass the business of the country, especially when the indications are so favorable that the national system will soon replace all of a merely local character, he is yet of the opinion that such discriminating legislation should be had as will induce the withdrawal of all other circulation than that issued under national authority, at the earliest practicable moment.

For a statement of the transactions of the Treasury during the past year, you are respectfully referred to the report of the Treasurer. The labors of that officer are largely increased by the number of depositories which have been designated under the act "to provide a national currency." The labors of the Treasurer, and also those of the Assistant Treasurers in the principal cities, and the depositories designated under the act of August 6, 1864, are necessarily proportionate to the vast amounts passing through their hands; and the pecuniary responsibilities of some are such as few men, whose character and capacity would justify so important a trust, are willing to assume. Necessarily obliged to surround themselves with a large number of assistants, for whose care and integrity they must be answerable, and to give bonds in amounts that few private fortunes would meet, a high degree of courage is required to endure the perplexities and incur the hazards of such an office. In view of these facts, and of the much better compensation readily paid to such men for labors much lighter, and responsibilities far less important, I cannot but recommend that the salaries of the Treasurer, and of the Assistant Treasurers, and of some of the designated depositories, be increased. Within the current year the Assistant Treasurer at New York having been compelled by ill health to resign, after long and most useful and honorable service, it became necessary to find a person qualified by his knowledge of business and financial affairs, by spotless character and acknowledged ability, to discharge the duties of that most important position. This the Secretary found to be extremely difficult, principally because the great pecuniary risk deterred men who had anything to lose, while the compensation allowed by law was much lower than is customarily paid for similar, but far inferior, service. The office was most reluctantly accepted by the present incumbent, who relinquished an honorable position, with a much higher salary, at the urgent solicitation of the Secretary, purely from a sense of patriotic duty. Impelled by the same honorable feeling, the Assistant Treasurer at St. Louis consented to withdraw his resignation, which had been tendered to the Department. Not only justice, but the best interests of the Government, require that such compensation be paid to all public officers as will enable them to discharge important trusts, freed from the harassing cares and anxieties attendant upon inadequate incomes, and bearing a just proportion to the nature and amount of service.

The difficulty of inadequate compensation has occasioned much embarrassment in other operations of this Department. Many persons of experience and skill, and who could readily command higher pay in similar employment elsewhere, have resigned their places in the Department. These places it has been found extremely difficult to fill, although there has been no reason to complain of a lack of applicants for employment. But in the vast and complicated affairs of the Treasury Department many persons are required possessing a high order of ability, derived both from study and experience, and without whose aid those affairs could not be well and speedily transacted. Such persons cannot be expected to remain in the public service and be content with a compensation too small for the daily wants of themselves and families, when solicited to accept other situations justly and even liberally remunerated. While, therefore, the Secretary does not favor high salaries, and feels as strongly as any one the necessity of strict economy, he is compelled to state this condition of things for the consideration of Congress.

The high rates of duties on imports, imposed by recent laws, afford such temptation to smuggling, and such facilities are presented for successful attempts to evade the revenue laws, by the extent and nature of our sea-coast, and more especially of our frontier, that the necessity of strenuous efforts to prevent and punish offenses of this kind is impressed upon this Department with daily increasing force. The attention of Congress is particularly invited to so much of the report of the Commissioner of Customs as relates to this very important subject. The act "to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1864, contains important provisions, which, if properly enforced, will, it is believed, prove highly efficient. Sufficient time, however, for all the preparations necessary to carry all of these provisions into effect has not as yet been afforded. In the mean time, a careful preliminary inspection has been made by the Commissioner, under instructions from the Secretary, along our sea-coast and frontier lines, and the result of his observations leads to the conviction that preparations on a large scale are in progress for extensive and systematic operations in smuggling across our northern and northeastern border. To prevent, or even to check these operations, an increase of preventive force will be absolutely necessary, and means should be placed at the disposal of the Department for that purpose, to be expended in such manner as the exigency may require. From the report of the Commissioner, and the nature of the case, it is no less obvious that an increase in the number of revenue boats, especially on the lakes, is not only expedient but necessary; and the appropriation for that object should also be increased, so as to meet the wants of the service.

The act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," modified, in several important particulars, preexisting laws upon the same subjects. So much of the act of July 13, 1861, as authorized the President to permit commercial relations in insurrectionary States and sections was repealed, except in certain specified cases. The rules and regulations with regard to commercial intercourse previously adopted have been modified accordingly. The second section largely extended the powers and responsibilities of this Department, by placing in its charge abandoned lands, houses, and tenements in insurrectionary States, for the purposes of occupation and lease, and still further by directing that provision should be made "in such lease, or otherwise, for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of national military occupation within said insurrectionary States, formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free." This clause is regarded as placing all such persons under the protection of this Department, through which their general welfare is to be provided for.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

HO. OF REPS.

In framing rules and regulations to carry the provisions of this act into effect, as directed in section eleven, such as were deemed essential to the proper execution of the powers conferred in relation to freedmen, were made, and approved by the President as required. It was, however, found necessary to suspend their operation for a time. This class of persons had been, and were yet, under the protection of the War Department, and the necessary provision for their welfare had been afforded under military authority and supervision. The arrangements made for this purpose contemplated a continuance of the system adopted through the current year. It was deemed advisable, therefore, to defer action in this regard until the time should arrive for commencing the operations of a new year, and in the mean time to allow the freedmen to remain as they had been, under military protection.

The eighth section of said act authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to appoint agents to purchase, on certain specified terms, any products of States declared in insurrection. The amount of funds placed at the disposal of the Secretary for that purpose was, however, so limited, that large operations on a cash basis were out of the question. In fact, the proper execution of the authority conferred by this provision of the statute has been attended with great embarrassment. After much consideration, however, a series of regulations was framed and approved, and several agents have been appointed, who have commenced operations under the law; but their appointment is so recent that no sufficient time has elapsed to afford a basis for any reliable opinion of the probable result. The Secretary is, however, of the opinion that, whether the hopes which may have been indulged of a considerable revenue to the Government from this source are realized or not, the incidental advantages of getting to market a reasonable supply of the products referred to would compensate any effort made by Government in that direction.

A copy of the rules and regulations, as revised, together with those relating to abandoned lands, houses, and tenements, providing for the care and employment of freedmen, and for the purchase of products, are appended to this report.

The Secretary has great satisfaction in stating that all expenses connected with executing the several acts restricting commercial intercourse, have been much more than paid by fees arising under the regulations heretofore adopted.

While the Secretary has great pleasure in stating that, so far as his personal knowledge extends, and so far as he is informed, the affairs of this Department have been well and satisfactorily conducted during the past year, an incident has occurred of a painful character, involving a possible loss to the Government, and tending to excite suspicion as to the integrity of some person, or persons, employed in conducting its operations.

On the 5th day of June last, Mr. C. P. Bailey, chief clerk and superintendent of the loan branch, connected with the Secretary's office, addressed a letter to the Secretary, stating that one hundred bonds, partially prepared for issue under the acts of July 17 and August 5, 1861, of $1,000 each, were missing, and no trace of them could be found. The bonds were numbered from 34,301 to 34,400, inclusive, and were a part of one thousand transmitted by the National Bank Note Company on the 26th of September, 1863. In his letter to the Secretary Mr. Bailey states: "I have exhausted all the resources at my command in endeavoring to find them, and nothing is left for me but to report the facts." A strict inquiry as to all the facts connected with the affair was immediately instituted, but no light was obtained further than to show that on the 29th of September previous Mr. Bailey sent the bonds in an open basket, with a weight placed on them, by two messengers, one of whom was an old clerk of established character, to the Register's office, and there offered them to the clerk who usually received the coupon bonds in the Register's room, who objected to taking charge of them on the ground that there was no place in the office where they could be safely kept, and requested that they might be taken back to the loan branch where there were good safes. Mr. Bailey was sent for, and after some consultation as to the proper place of deposit, consented that they should be taken back and deposited in the safe in his office, and they were accordingly carried back by the same messengers, taken out of the basket, laid on the table, and in the course of the day placed in the safe, where they remained, as supposed, until called for by the Register. They were called for and delivered from time to time from March 17 to June 5, 1864, when the loss was discovered. The character of all the parties concerned is reported as above suspicion, and nothing has since transpired to elucidate the matter, or to furnish any indication as to what has become of the missing bonds.

As they had not been signed by the Register, or sealed, they cannot be negotiated. The coupons, however, were sealed and complete, and payable to bearer on January and July 1, in each year. A careful examination was made of the January coupons paid on bonds of that issue, but it does not appear that any of them had been paid. These would be known by their numbers. Instructions were given the Assistant Treasurers to watch carefully for these coupons, but nothing further has been elicited. No other steps have been taken, as none appeared likely to be attended with any effect. With this exception, I am not aware that any loss has occurred in the Department.

For the detailed operations of the Mint and its branches I respectfully refer to the report of the Superintendent of the Mint. The total value of the bullion deposited at the Mint and branches during the last fiscal year is $24,920,808 47, of which $23,986,989 92 was in gold and $933,818 55 in silver. Deducting the redeposits, there remain the actual deposits, amounting to $24,012,741 49. The coinage for the year was, in gold coin, $21,649,345; gold bars, $2,333,403 31; silver coin, $548,214 10; silver bars, $301,872 89; cents, $463,800; total coinage, $25,296,635 30. The number of pieces of all denominations coined was 46,983,396. Of this coinage $3,560,436 40, in 45,114,276 pieces, was at Philadelphia; $19,536,809 02, in 1,869,120 pieces, at San Francisco; and $1,876,377 04, in gold and silver bars, at New York.

The branch mint at Denver has confined its operations to melting, refining, assaying, and stamping bullion. The number of bars thus stamped was five hundred and thirty-two, of the value of $486,329 97. The cost of transportation from the Denver mint to the seaboard, coupled with the disturbed condition of the Indians on the route, have operated thus far to prevent the full development of the usefulness of this branch mint. I have hopes that the efforts now making may prove successful, so far as to obviate in great part the difficulties referred to.

A question of title to the proposed site of the branch mint at Nevada, authorized by Congress, has intervened to prevent any further steps from being taken toward its establishment, and no further steps can be taken until Congress shall have perfected the title.

As soon as proper information can be obtained, the necessary measures will be taken for the establishment of a branch mint at Dailes City, Oregon, in pursuance of the act of July 4, 1864.

Preliminary examinations and reports have been ordered relative to a new building for the mint at San Francisco, authorized by the act of July 2, 1864.

As in preceding years, the great value of the coast survey is constantly impressed upon the Government. While its operations upon the northern coast have been continued without interruption, details of its officers have continued to be furnished to the Army and Navy, who have rendered services of great importance in the conduct of the war, and contributed largely to the success of various military and naval operations, not only upon the coast, but in the interior, as frequently testified by the officers in command.

The light-houses and buoys in charge of the Light-House Board have been maintained at the recognized standard of excellence. Some suggestions are made by the board tending to render the system still more efficient, to carry out which estimates have been submitted. The restoration of lights, injured or destroyed by the rebels, has been proceeded with as rapidly as the territory has been brought within the control of the United States forces. And it is believed that the same unbroken chain which was exhibited before the war will soon be reestablished along the whole coast of the United States.

The Secretary refers with satisfaction to the reports of the heads of the several bureaus and offices, as exhibiting the onerous duties devolving upon them, and the great amount of labor performed, all of which has been, with few exceptions, bestowed cheerfully and assiduously. An increase of force is required in the bureaus of the Second and Third Auditors, and the Second Comptroller, to prevent a vast accumulation of business, injurious to claimants and embarrassing to the Government.

The lease of the premises now occupied as a custom-house in New York will expire on the 1st day of May next. It may, under the provisions of the contract of lease, be purchased by the Government for $1,000,000, if notice to that effect is given three months before its termination. The premises are suitable and convenient for custom-house purposes, and of greater value than the sum named. If the purchase is to be made, the Secretary should be seasonably authorized to give the stipulated notice, and the necessary appropriation made before the adjournment of Congress. This purchase has been heretofore recommended in two successive reports, and in that recommendation the Secretary fully concurs.

In closing this report, the Secretary feels that he cannot but follow the example of his predecessor, in gratefully acknowledging the obligation he is under to the Assistant Secretaries and other officers of the Treasury Department, not only for the cheerfulness and devotion with which their own peculiar duties have been discharged, but for the kindness and zeal with which they have striven to lighten his labors, and enable him to sustain, however imperfectly, the weight of a most onerous and embarrassing position.

NAVAL DEPOT FOR IRON-CLADS.

SPEECH OF HON. S. J. RANDALL,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 13, 1864,

On the bill (H. R. No. 536) authorizing a survey at and near New London, Connecticut, and the establishment of a navy-yard for iron-clad vessels thereat, the pending question being upon the following substitute proposed by Mr. KELLEY:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert: That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept from the city of Philadelphia a title to League Island on behalf of the Government, if said title be perfect, and to establish thereat a navy-yard and depot for the construction, docking, and repair of iron, iron-clad, and other vessels.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, said:
Mr. SPEAKER: The question of the location and construction of a navy-yard for the building of iron-clad vessels has been before Congress for its consideration and action for a long time, and has been discussed at so much length as to render it unnecessary for me at this period of the debate to enlarge. I shall therefore confine myself to a few points which I consider should have weight in determining the judgment of this House.

New London, Connecticut, Chester, and League Island, on the Delaware river, are the locations which have engrossed the attention of the committee who have had the subject immediately under consideration. The friends of New London in and out of this House have been most assiduous in their labors, and all that ingenuity and the political power of eastern association could do has been brought to the aid of the New London site, and yet it is manifest that while it possesses a good harbor and sufficient depth of water, there are still insurmountable difficulties to its selection.

In case of any foreign war or domestic rebellion—such as now exists—New London would not, in my judgment, be beyond the reach of an enemy's ships of war, gunboats, or iron-clad rams, and would be in constant danger of occupancy by soldiers of our foe. This is quite sufficient to place New London out of the list of competing locations. Gentlemen on this floor find it necessary to devote in its behalf much exhibition of apparent scientific knowledge to turn aside this fact. So paramount did the board of officers, appointed under the act of Congress approved July 15, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept the title to League Island, in the Delaware river, for naval purposes," consider it that they set forth this importance among cardinal rules adopted for the performance of their duty, as follows:

"Security from attack by an enemy, and facility and economy of defense. To be easily defended from its own topographical advantages. To be easily reinforced by troops from a dense population within easy marching distance. Not easily blockaded. Not too near the mouth of a bay or river."

And, if further proof of this fact were necessary, I beg leave to refer to the report of an efficient and competent board of naval officers who assembled in 1820, who were called together as to coast defenses, wherein this point is perhaps more strongly presented.

The majority report, in summing up under this head, state, in comparing League Island with New London, as follows:

"The board is of the opinion that either of the sites under examination may be promptly and efficiently defended, and that upon this question they may be regarded as equal."

You will mark the mildness of the expression, as contradicting the minority report on the same point:

"In security from an attack by an enemy, and facility and economy of defense, League Island, which is seventy miles from the mouth of one of the most defensible rivers of the United States, is greatly superior as a site for a navy-yard to Winthrop's Point, which is three and one eighth miles from the mouth of the Thames river. League Island is secure from a naval attack by rifle projectiles; Winthrop's Point is not. The permanent defenses of Philadelphia defend League Island, and with obstructions in the channel, defended by temporary or permanent works, and iron-clads above them, the river is amply secure. The defenses required by the site itself are almost nothing. Neither of these remarks applies to the Thames river. The present works on the Thames would be insufficient for defense of a naval depot from even a water attack, and expensive works would be required to defend the station from a land attack, either from the east and north or from the south and west. League Island is easily defended by its own topographical advantages, being separated from the main land by an arm of the river which requires bridging or a causeway, and is therefore defensible. League Island has greatly the advantage in regard to defense by troops, from a dense population within easy marching distance. The militia draft within twenty miles of Philadelphia is 142,932 men, while within twenty miles of New London it is but about six thousand men. League Island is nearer to New York than Winthrop's Point is. The Thames river is as easily effectively blockaded as the Delaware; probably it will be more so when a fort shall have been erected at the breakwater. Winthrop's Point has been already stated to be near the mouth of the river Thames. Dutch Island harbor was rejected on this, among other grounds, and is three and five eighths miles from Narragansett entrance. The defenses of the Delaware, except the fort at the breakwater and field-works, are finished; those for the Thames, to defend a navy-yard site, are yet to be made. Fort Trumbull (a permanent work of a small class) and Fort Griswold (an earthwork) will not suffice for the defense of a first-class navy-yard; on the contrary, very expensive permanent works must be added for this purpose. The position of a navy-yard commanded by heights of some sixty to eighty feet, within distances of from one half to two miles, is an unsafe one, and would be the case of a navy-yard at Winthrop's Point, near New London. The filling of League Island over a space of one hundred acres, would reduce nineteen acres of Red Bank, five eighths to one fourth mile distant, to four feet above mean high water. Therefore it would not even be necessary to fortify Red Bank for the protection of the navy-yard, though it might be expedient, from other considerations, to do so, at least by temporary works.

"The expenditure necessary to render moderately secure the site of a navy-yard near Winthrop's Point from a combined naval and land attack in front and on the flanks would be out of all proportion to the object to be gained, whereas that at League Island is rendered secure by the defenses necessary for the city of Philadelphia, which are below it, nearer to the mouth of the river, as Fort Mifflin, Fort Delaware, and other less permanent works, in co-operation with which would be floating batteries and obstructions of the river, protected from removal by temporary or permanent works, and by floating batteries or iron-clad steamers."

Now, after reading these two reports on this particular question of the controversy between the two locations, can any one doubt? The first one is, to say the least, equivocal, while the last is full, clear, and convincing. And upon this question of a proper defense nothing can be left to doubt. As to League Island there is none, and it should carry conviction to every mind, and decides the main and all-important consideration in favor of League Island. For what use would a navy-yard be, if, in time of war, when most wanted, it was liable at any time to be captured or destroyed by fire through the means of shells?

The next point is the importance of fresh water as in comparison with salt water. On this both parties seem to agree, in so far as iron vessels are concerned, and I believe the proposed yard is for such.

The most of scientific or mechanical men who have had experience in this respect speak without hesitation, and say that fresh water is indispensable to the construction of iron vessels.

League Island is located in fresh water; New London is not. Listen to the two reports. The New London report says:

"At League Island the water is fresh, and in this respect the board is of the opinion that the advantage is with League Island, so far as iron vessels are concerned."

The League Island report says:

"The water is perfectly fresh at League Island at all periods of the tide, and under all its variations and those of the winds. The site is therefore vastly superior to that of Winthrop's Point, where the water is salt at all times, especially for iron vessels. The bottom of an iron vessel fouled by a sea voyage would be cleaned and perhaps the grass be killed, by remaining at League Island anchorage. The fresh water at League Island has little or no effect upon the iron of a vessel, while the salt water of Winthrop's Point corrodes the material more or less rapidly even when coated, and the coating itself is an expensive operation."

"The spray from salt water in storms is very injurious to machinery near the sea shore, and to this the works at New London would be exposed, while those at League Island would not."

After reading these two statements no candid mind can avoid yielding to League Island superiority. This is the second great advantage in favor of League Island.

The third and last point is as to the means of procuring supplies and materials for the construction of vessels.

The supplies necessary have certainly as good if not a better market at Philadelphia than they would have at New London; but this is a small matter as compared with the iron, machinery, coal, and timber.

As to iron and coal, no one can deny the proximity of League Island to the immense iron ore beds; and the inexhaustible mines of coal answer in behalf of that site. On this all of the board and all who have spoken or who have written agree.

The means of manufacturing machinery are quite as ample in Pennsylvania as in Connecticut. And I am not aware that New London has any advantage over League Island in ability to procure the proper growth of timber.

Thus I have shown that upon the three main points which should be considered in the choice of a location for a navy-yard, League Island has greatly, and beyond dispute, the advantage.

I have made no attempt to color either one favorably, or the other unfavorably. I have taken each report and placed them side by side in contrast, so that all may judge, each one for himself.

I have made no allusion to the position of the great State of Pennsylvania and the claim she may be supposed to have at this time upon the General Government. My wish has been only to fairly state the facts, and having done so, I leave the matter to take its proper course in this House.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

SPEECH OF HON. DEW. C. LITTLEJOHN, OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 1, 1865,

On the bill (H. R. No. 126) to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, and amendment to construct a ship-canal from the Mississippi to the Lakes.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to be obliged to oppose the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] to the bill which I have introduced, having for its object the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara within our own territory. I am not hostile, nor do many who propose to vote with me against the amendment, feel hostile to the construction of a canal from Chicago to the Mississippi river. I oppose it, because I fear the adoption of the amendment will defeat the whole bill, many members upon this floor being decidedly opposed to the union of these measures in the same bill. There are many, sir, very many, upon this floor who, while they are in favor of both projects, the communication around the falls of Niagara, and the Illinois ship-canal, cannot and will not assent to uniting them in one act, as it would encourage propositions for other works of a similar character. I am opposed to omnibus bills. Wise legislation demands that each measure should stand or fall upon its own merits.

Now, sir, I propose to show how much more important to the East and West is the canal around the falls of Niagara than the canal proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. First, let us examine the question in its military point of view. The President of the United States has notified the English Government of our intention to rescind that portion of the treaty of 1817 which limits each Power to one armed vessel upon the great northern chain of lakes. Under this notice it will become necessary for the defense of a frontier three thousand miles long, forming a navigable boundary for eight of the most important States of the Union, with an aggregate population of over ten millions, with its numerous large towns and cities engaged in an inland commerce far exceeding the entire foreign commerce of the whole nation, to construct at great cost and maintain distinct and independent naval fleets upon Lake Ontario below and the upper lakes above the falls.

The Niagara ship-canal, when constructed, it will readily be perceived, does away with the necessity for this double fleet, affording a means of concentrating our vessels-of-war at any given point upon any one of the entire chain of lakes, thus rendering all the lakes practically one for purposes of defense.

On Lake Ontario and St. Lawrence river the commercial marine of the Canadians greatly exceeds the American tonnage; while on the upper lakes above the falls it is almost exclusively American, consisting of over sixteen hundred vessels. A large proportion of these are of a class too large to pass the locks of the Welland canal even if its use should be accorded to us by the Canadian government.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to ask my colleague a question: how wide is the Niagara river below the falls to Lake Ontario?

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. It is sufficiently wide for the purpose to navigation.

Mr. GANSON. By the maps and from my own knowledge, it is about a quarter of a mile wide. The heights on the Canadian side, as my colleague knows, command the American side, and from the Canadian side a shell could at any moment be dropped into the locks of this canal, causing an explosion which would tear them to pieces, and render the canal entirely useless as a means of communication for defensive purposes.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I am aware of the objection stated by my colleague. This communication, if it be constructed, can be used for the purpose of concentrating our Navy up to the hour of the declaration of war. When a declaration of war has been made by the English Government or our own, then the protection of this communication as well as of the city which the gen-deman represents, lying under the guns of Canada, would demand that a sufficient force should cross the river to take immediate possession of the western bank.

Mr. GANSON. I would say to my colleague that my constituents and their neighbors, in case of a difficulty with Great Britain, propose to march over and have the fight on the Canadian side, and take the entire peninsula, without relying on gunboats.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. That is precisely my proposition; in that respect we agree.

Now, sir, England has constructed a perfect communication from the Atlantic to the lakes and through the lakes. She has to-day a canal ten feet deep, with locks two hundred feet long and fifty feet broad, around the rapids between Montreal and Ogdensburg. She has also an inland canal called the Rideau canal, constructed for military purposes alone, with locks one hundred and forty feet long by thirty-three in width, connecting Montreal with Kingston. The Welland canal, about thirty miles in length, with locks one hundred and fifty feet in length and twenty-six feet in width, with ten feet depth of water, connects Lakes Erie and Ontario on Canadian soil, a few miles inland to the west of Niagara river, with capacity to pass vessels and gunboats of four hundred tons burden.

The English Government has located naval depots at Kingston, on Lake Ontario, Malden, on Lake Erie, and Penetanguishene, upon Georgian bay, on Lake Huron, and those depots are well supplied to-day with naval stores and munitions of war, ready for a conflict. She has in her waters a hundred gunboats of a size adapted to the navigation of the canals referred to which can be thrown upon these lakes at once; and, sir, if she contemplates a war, they will be placed upon the lakes before the declaration of war is made, and the whole frontier, every city from Ogdensburg to Chicago, will be under the guns of British gunboats.

It will be admitted, then, that her communications are perfect. She has intended for the last half a century that they should be so. Now, what do we propose? Why, sir, to make this great chain of lakes one sea by this communication for all purposes of military and naval defense. Sound policy demands that no reliance be placed on any canal of six feet depth of water, whether from the Mississippi to Chicago or the Hudson to Lake Ontario to supply the lakes with gunboats of size, capacity, and caliber to contend with the larger and superior class of boats which it has been shown are at the command of our northern neighbors. Boats of such draft of water and such dimensions could never withstand the tempests of the lakes, and would therefore be wholly inadequate for purposes of defense. It becomes the American people, then, to provide every means of defense in the power of the Government upon the lakes themselves.

As I remarked when interrupted by my colleague, there are sixteen hundred merchant vessels upon the lakes above the falls, most of them too large to pass the Welland canal, if its use was accorded to us by the Canadian authorities. Those vessels could be converted into gunboats in the space of six or eight weeks, and could be concentrated by the proposed canal on Lake Ontario for purposes of defense to meet the British fleet when it leaves the St. Lawrence and enters the lakes at or near Kingston. It must be admitted that if there is a great naval battle upon any of these lakes, it will be first fought on Lake Ontario. Is that lake not the key to the whole? Naval success on Lake Ontario, where her waters seek the St. Lawrence in their progress to the ocean, is a guarantee of protection to the entire chain of lakes, while success confined to Lake Erie or the upper lakes alone would be an abandonment of Lake Ontario to the enemy. The inland commerce of our northern lakes, in magnitude twice as great as all the foreign commerce of the whole nation, and in which ten million American citizens are interested, demands immediate protection. It is threatened by a foreign Power unscrupulous in times of war. The construction of one fleet, having the range of the entire chain of the northern seas, is the only efficient mode of defense now within our reach. It would be suicidal to incur even the hazard of interruption of this trade and commerce. While the westward-bound commerce is highly important to the comfort and prosperity of the western States, their agricultural products are indispensable to the eastern States. The arrest of the eastward-bound movement of food by British supremacy on the lakes, even for a short period, would create a state of suffering to the inhabitants of New England and the Atlantic States unparalleled in the history of our country. And yet, as it were, under the guns of a foreign nation jealous of our commercial prosperity and increasing national power, and constantly assuming a threatening attitude toward us on the slightest pretenses, these great municipal and commercial interests are utterly unprotected.

These, sir, are briefly some of the military considerations which imperatively demand the construction of the canal provided for by this bill. But, sir, it is no objection to the construction of this canal as a military proposition that it is of great importance to both the East and the West as a commercial avenue or highway. I make here the broad assertion, to which I call the attention of western members, that the figures will show that the construction of this ship-canal will cheapen the transportation of every bushel of grain sent to the eastern markets at least five cents a bushel. Figures prove this, and you ask me how. It has been the policy of the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor to compel the products of the great West to pass over her long line of canals, three hundred and forty-five miles from Lake Erie to the Hudson. Construct this ship-canal, and the inland canal navigation from the lakes to the Hudson will not exceed one hundred and seventy miles. The difference is over one hundred and fifty miles. You thus substitute deep water, free lake navigation, and save over one hundred and fifty miles of expensive canal transportation. The toll levied upon that length of canal is, on wheat, corn, and flour, and like property, one dollar per ton. By the terms of this bill it is provided that on similar property the toll shall not exceed twenty cents per ton. Here, then, is the saving of eighty cents per ton upon all property which requires to be transported from the Northwest to the East in the item of tolls alone.

The cost of transportation will be further diminished by the substitution of large vessels for small.

The cost of one trip of a steam propeller of four hundred tons by the present Welland canal is $1,541. Per ton.....	$3 85
The cost of one trip of a steam propeller of one thousand tons by the proposed Niagara ship-canal would be $3,435. Per ton.....	2 43

Difference in favor of large propeller per ton.....$1 42 equal to $1,420 on a single trip. This with the saving in tolls would give a total of about $2 20 per ton. Those familiar with the tonnage of the lakes will appreciate the importance of the proposed improvement. Those who do not will understand the interest the northern States have in this question when they learn that the eastward movement of western property the last two seasons by all eastern communications reached nearly five million tons each season.

The capacity of the proposed Niagara canal will be about thirty-two thousand tons per day, or equal to about eight million tons in an ordinary season of navigation.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York what assurance he can give to the people of the West that the tolls upon the canal from Oswego will not be increased so as to preserve the equilibrium of tolls between that point and between Buffalo and tide-water?

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I should have reached that point in a moment; but I will answer the gentleman. The construction of the Niagara ship-canal, passing vessels of twelve or fifteen hundred tons to the lower end of Lake Ontario, will compel the State of New York to enlarge her canal from Oswego, and will also compel the State, in competition with the St. Lawrence, to place the tolls at the lowest possible rates.

But there is another guarantee upon which I place the more reliance, and that is, private competition. Permit the grain and other products of the Northwest to reach the lower end of Lake Ontario, and the capitalists of New York and the Northwest will construct through lines of railroads from that point to the Hudson, which will compel the State of New York to reduce the toll from the figure at which it now stands. Twenty-four hours would suffice to pass the grain from Lake Ontario by a line of railway one hundred and sixty miles in length to the Hudson, elevated at one quarter of a cent per bushel from the lake vessel to the cars and transferred to the barges on the Hudson river by the laws of gravitation. This I deem a conclusive reply to my friend from Iowa. While grain and produce generally cannot be carried cheaply on long lines of railroads, as from Lake Erie to the Hudson, yet, on a short line like this referred to, and on descending grades, the cost will little if any exceed the charge by canal.

The friends from the Northwest know that there are to-day lying in the depots of the Erie and the Central railroads thousands of tons of property which was placed there before the close of navigation, and which cannot yet be transported to New York.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman, inasmuch as I represent a district lying far to the west of Chicago, to inform this House how that great region of country which lies west of Chicago, is to avail itself of the benefits of this cheap transportation without a water line of transportation which shall run westward from Chicago, and connect the region west of the Mississippi with this cheap water line of transportation to the East?

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. Sir, it is contrary to human wisdom to enlarge the sources of a mountainous stream without opening first its outlets, and my friend from Iowa may pile the corn and wheat of Iowa and other western States mountains high upon the shores of Lake Michigan, and without large additional facilities eastward it will avail him nothing.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I think I can suggest a remedy, certainly one which would be perfect when peace shall be restored, and yet I fear that the remedy which I would propose would not meet with favor at the hands of the gentleman from New York, and that is, to so improve the navigation of the Mississippi river, that great highway of the commerce of the West, as to make it an uninterrupted water communication from St. Paul to the Gulf of Mexico. A proposition will be submitted, if not as an amendment to this bill, as an original bill in this House, to canal the two rapids in the Mississippi river, which will give to the western country a water communication connected with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and with the Pennsylvania Central railroad; so that we shall have that advantage as well as the one which the gentleman proposes to give us.

Now, from the remarks which the gentleman from New York has made in relation to the pending amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] I fear that this proposition will not meet with more favor than that, and yet I may say to him that unless we can secure these lines of transportation between Chicago and the great country west of it his proposed improvement will amount to but very little.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. In reply to my friend from Iowa, I will say that so far as my own views are concerned on this question, I am in favor of the most liberal construction of communications, whether by rail or by water, in all parts of the United States. Such has been the position I have always occupied in my own State, and such will be the position I shall occupy upon this floor. Like the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] I claim to be a citizen of the United States, and of no single State. As an independent proposition, I will vote for any measure that the gentleman from Iowa may bring in, but I do object to loading down a more important proposition with amendments until it sinks by its own weight, and fails to receive the approval of a majority of the members upon this floor.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Iowa that it seems to me that the States west of the Mississippi river will participate in the benefits of this Niagara canal as well as those lying upon the lakes. The products of the States west of the Mississippi river are now carried to the Atlantic sea-board through the navigable waters of the lakes, and hence those States will enjoy the benefits of the cheaper transportation which this proposed ship-canal will afford to the States bordering upon the lakes.

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest, in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the country lying west of Chicago, without water communication with that city, will be at the mercy of the railway corporations connecting that western country with the lines of lake transportation, and that gentleman knows full well—at least I know full well—that the tariffs of freights upon those railways running west of Chicago are so adjusted as to make up the difference in the reduction of freights east from Chicago, and this work would be no accommodation to us unless we had through water communication to Chicago. What we may gain in saving of transportation by this means will be made up by the persons controlling the lines of railroad west from Chicago by an increase of rates of freight.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. Mr. Speaker—to resume my remarks where I left off—the construction of this ship-canal permits a vessel laden with the products of the West to seek the lowest point on the chain of lakes nearest tide-water before breaking cargo. I have undoubtedly convinced the mind of every member on this floor that it will cause a saving on the New York canals of eighty cents per ton, which is nearly three cents per bushel. There is still another saving that will be effected. Very few vessels are now being constructed on the lakes of a size that can pass the Welland canal. Vessels of a larger size, being more economical, are built, confining the trade to the long line of canals terminating on Lake Erie above the falls. Hence, year by year, the trade of the great West with Lake Ontario is being lessened. When a ship-canal shall be opened that will allow a larger class of vessels to pass, then these vessels that are now confined to the upper lakes will come into competition with those of a smaller class. You will find vessels of fifteen hundred tons running from Buffalo to the lower end of Lake Ontario, a distance of over one hundred and fifty miles, in twenty-four hours, in competition with the canal-boats of two hundred tons burden the same distance on the Erie canal. This difference in capacity further cheapens the cost of transportation to an amount fully equal to the saving in tolls.

Again: time is an important consideration in the movement of the products of the great food-producing States of the West. A steam propeller, laden with thirty thousand bushels of grain or other property, would make the passage from Chicago to the lower end of Lake Ontario in five or six days. Her cargo, by the rail proposed, would be delivered to the barge on the Hudson in one day, and by that barge be placed alongside of ship for transhipment to a foreign market in one day more, making a total of seven or eight days from Chicago to the sea-coast. It would be safe to assume the average time would not exceed ten days. Thus if the State of New York did not provide adequate facilities by her canals the products of the West could be taken, in the mode indicated, with regularity, in eight or ten days from the city of Chicago to the docks of New York. And what I say about New York applies equally to New England.

What are the facilities that you have now for the transportation of products east and west? The Baltimore and Ohio railroad, the Pennsylvania railroad, the New York and Erie, the New York Central, and the Erie canal. Last year there were not transportation facilities for one ton where there were two tons ready for shipment. In 1862 the western States sent to eastern markets one hundred and thirty-five million bushels of grain. Ten years hence, with enlarged and adequate means of transportation, that amount will be increased to five hundred millions. There are now in Illinois two hundred million bushels of grain, one fourth of which will never reach tide-water for want of avenues either by rail or water.

Let us see what are some of the advantages to be derived from opening this communication. I have shown the saving of toll, and the saving by the substitution of large craft for small. Put the two together, and you have a clear saving of five cents on every bushel of grain. Five cents a bushel on the one hundred and thirty-five million bushels transported in 1862 gives you a total of $6,750,000 of saving, to be divided between the producing States of the Northwest and the consumers of New England and New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. There is one law of trade which is to be observed, and that is, that all competing lines are brought to a level, or to nearly a level, with the cheapest. If the lake route is cheaper, then must every competing line reduce its rates of transportation in order to retain its business, so that the construction of this canal will benefit the entire northern States of the Union. Increase the amount of grain transported to two hundred million bushels, and I hope it will reach that amount the present year, and the saving in the cost of transportation will be $10,000,000, to be divided between the consumers and the producers. When this communication and others shall be opened, and when the amount shall be increased to five hundred million bushels, the annual saving will be $25,000,000 annually.

But that is not the whole of the saving. It is well known by those who deal in the products of the West, that whenever the present limited means of communication are filled to excess, the rates advance from five cents to twenty-five cents a bushel. I have known fifty cents a bushel to be paid for the transportation of wheat from Chicago to the Atlantic; while, under the communication that we propose, these rates would be, almost universally, within twenty cents.

The cost of the proposed canal, in consequence of its size, the rock excavation, and its great amount of lockage, will be so large that private enterprise cannot undertake its construction; the State of New York will not. The only mode left, then, is to apply to the General Government. I submit, therefore, whether wise statesmanship, at a time when our people are groaning under taxation, incident to the war, does not most clearly demand that we should grant Government aid to the amount sought by this bill, and in bonds, too, not payable for twenty years, when it is so clearly demonstrable that the people will save each year not less than the whole amount asked for. I desire to be placed upon record as predicting that, upon the completion of the Niagara ship-canal, and the consequent increased facilities from Lake Ontario to the tide-water which will inevitably follow, that the annual saving to producer and consumer in transportation will average over fifteen million dollars during the lifetime of the bonds proposed to be loaned. Our duty then is plain.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend when I arose to occupy so much of the time of the House. I will trespass but a moment more, and then close. I have shown to the Northwest the important interest which she has in the construction of this communication. I trust I have convinced members representing the food-producing States that it is of more importance to them that this eastern outlet should be immediately opened than that the Illinois ship-canal should be built, and that its construction should not be defeated or risked by coupling it with any other measure.

It is important, perhaps, to show when you reach the lower lakes what means of communication will connect you with the Atlantic. There is the railway communication by way of Rochester and the Central and Erie railroad, and so on to the Pennsylvania mines. Application has been made to the Legislature of New York for a charter to construct a ship-canal from Sodus bay, on the south shore of Lake Ontario, to pass through Cayuga and Seneca lakes to a point near the Pennsylvania line, in order to receive the anthracite coals of Pennsylvania, and distribute them at the lowest possible price over the whole Northwest.

A railroad is being constructed from Sodus south via Auburn to Binghamton, connecting with the Erie and Delaware and Lackawanna railroads, while a road is already being operated from Oswego in connection with the same roads, forming continuous lines to New York, the coal fields of Pennsylvania, and the city of Philadelphia. By these roads the coal fields of Pennsylvania are brought much nearer the lakes than by any other lines which now exist or can hereafter be made.

At Oswego the enlarged Oswego and Erie canal connects with the Hudson river at Troy, with its double tier of locks eastward from Syracuse.

Two railroads also connect this important point with the Central railroad.

At Cape Vincent the Rome and Watertown railroad now receives large consignments of lake produce and delivers the same in New York either by Central railroad or the Erie canal from Rome.

The projected railroad from the Hudson to Lake Ontario via Saratoga is being rapidly pushed to completion, and will form an important avenue for western produce.

From Ogdensburg you have a railroad over which the city of Boston last year supported a line of fifteen steam propellers in her trade with the western States, a trade likely to be interrupted instantly by an order in council of the Canadian board of works in prohibiting the use of the Welland canal. By this line large amounts of property are sent to New York via Lake Champlain and canal. Then again at Montreal you have a railway connection with Portland by which commerce is destined in the future to grow to immense proportions. Again, there are those engaged in our lake commerce who contend that the cheapest water communication which can ever be opened with the lakes is from the St. Lawrence river at Montreal through Lake Champlain, leaving only a canal of sixty miles in length from the foot of Lake Champlain to the navigable waters of the Hudson.

The construction of the Niagara ship-canal of the size proposed gives to the West all these competing lines in addition to those now available to her use, from the lakes above the falls. I respectfully call the attention of my friend from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] to these additional avenues. If, however, the eastern States are so far negligent of their interests as to withhold facilities for transportation through and into their territories, then the Northwest, by permission of the Canadian authorities, can use the St. Lawrence river as an easement to the ocean. In my judgment it will only be availed of under such circumstances.

Mr. BLOW. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Littlejohn] has alluded to the St. Lawrence. I desire to remind him that we have a stream running through our country; and that upon that stream and its tributaries there is as great a tonnage as upon the lakes. I ask him, what does he propose to do with that immense tonnage when the navigation of that river is again fully restored? Is that tonnage to remain idle, or is it to be compelled, by the building of such canals as he proposes, to contend with the great routes to New York? I assert that before this rebellion broke out we transported the grain of Illinois and Iowa by way of New Orleans to the Atlantic ports at one fourth of the price that it is being transported for to-day. Let the gentleman meet that question before he asks us to throw open a connection with the lakes by way of the Illinois river.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I have already stated that there are many upon this floor who oppose this amendment who will vote for it as an independent proposition.

Mr. BLOW. Will the gentleman refer me to any time in the history of this Government when thirty thousand miles of inland seas have ever been improved by a public appropriation of any magnitude?

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. The greatest lake of the whole chain was connected with the lower lakes by St. Mary's canal, built by a donation from the United States Government. That is an argument in favor of the construction of the canal around the falls of Niagara. But I desire to correct my friend from Missouri [Mr. Blow] in one thing. I hold in my hand an extract from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year ending August 31, 1860, to show the importance of the Mississippi river as an outlet for the products of the northwestern States. I do not intend to depreciate the trade supposed to be confined to that river, but to show the little importance of that river to the producing States of the northwest.

In 1860 New Orleans exported to foreign ports 2,189 bushels of wheat, as against 1,880,908 bushels from New York; 224,000 bushels of corn, as against 1,580,014 bushels from New York. Of flour there was exported from New Orleans 80,540 barrels; from New York, 1,187,200 barrels. Now, sir, I do not refer to this in the way of opposition to the navigation of the Mississippi river; I refer to it to show that we can never depend upon that river for the transportation of grain, in consequence of the great heat of that climate. A gentleman near me asks how much pork was exported from New Orleans. From that port there was exported 4,250 barrels; from New York, 109,379 barrels. Sir, what has been in the past will be in the future. I repeat that the cheapest outlet for her products which the Northwest can have upon American soil is by using the entire chain of lakes—that chain proposed to be made available by the construction of the Niagara ship-canal. Had the Niagara river been unbroken by the falls, had it been left by nature navigable as is the Detroit, no one will for a moment contend that a vessel bound toward tide-water with her cargo would ever have broken bulk until she reached the nearest point to that tide-water, namely, the foot of Lake Ontario. This proposed canal removes nature's obstructions.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Davis.

Sir, what is the interest of the eastern States, of my own State, of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, in this question? I warn gentlemen who represent those States, engaged in an honorable competition for the trade of the Northwest, that if the State of New York should oppose herself to this proposition, she will compel what the Northwest has asked for, what Illinois sent a committee appointed by her Legislature to ask of the Canadian Government, the construction of the Ottawa ship-canal. I desire to call the attention of Representatives from New York, and Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, and the New England States, to this consideration; if you desire to part with this great trade of the Northwest, then withhold this communication, compelling thereby, as you will, the immediate construction of the Ottawa ship-canal. What is that? A slack-water navigation for vessels of one thousand tons' burden, from Georgia bay to Montreal, placing Montreal ninety miles nearer to Chicago and Milwaukee than is the city of Buffalo by water, and six hundred miles nearer by water than the city of New York, Boston, or the city of Philadelphia. Has not the East the same interest in this great question? Shall we withhold the construction of this great communication? If so, for what reason? The present means of transportation are overburdened. Point me, if you can, to a single new line of railway or canal, projected or being constructed, between the West and the East. What steps is the State of New York taking for the enlargement of her communications? Where is the Northwest to find an outlet for the next ten years if this outlet be denied to them? What will be the amount of those products ten years hence? Why, sir, she will raise one thousand million bushels of grain for a market over her own consumption. Not one acre in ten of the great grain-producing States of the Northwest is yet under cultivation. When this war shall have closed this country will go forward in a tide of prosperity never witnessed before in the history of the world. Emigration from the Old World and from the eastern States will scatter itself far and wide over the western prairies and the southern soil. I predict, sir, we cannot too soon provide outlets to distribute our productions to the markets of the Old World.

Sir, we have a deeper interest still. When the war shall have closed, we shall have contracted, for the preservation of the Government, a debt of perhaps three or four thousand million dollars. Is it not proper that we should look to the means of extinguishing that debt by sending our produce to Europe, every bushel bringing back a gold dollar? Where would we stand to-day with an exportation of five hundred million bushels to European markets? Independent, financially, of every Power upon the face of the globe. Gentlemen may say that foreign markets cannot consume such an amount of our products. I have here a letter from Baring Brothers & Company, of England, showing that when the price reaches a certain low price, still a remunerative figure to us, the European markets can, if there be cheap communication with the West, receive and consume five hundred million bushels of grain.

This question grows in magnitude as we discuss it. I hope that this bill will pass without any amendments, except such as are calculated to perfect it. As I prepared the bill, I will call the attention of the House to its main features, and then resume my seat. The State of New York last winter refused to charter a company to come here and ask aid to construct this canal. That, in my judgment, was because its importance was not appreciated. I desire to say that although there is no great party in that State, yet it is well known that there is a party adverse to the opening of short lines through the State, contending that it would reduce the revenue of the Erie canal. This, perhaps, is not the place to discuss that question. This bill provides that a ship-canal shall be constructed about the falls as a military work. It directs the President to appoint commissioners to survey this line. After the survey is made and the route determined on, the President is directed to procure the right of way by negotiation if possible; if not, by an application to the court for the appointment of commissioners to appraise the damages upon the principle on which damages are appraised under the railroad act of New York.

Up to that point the General Government acts. And now, in order to benefit by private enterprise, in order to save to the Government a large expenditure of the Government money, the President, having procured the right of way, is authorized to contract with any responsible corporate company to enter upon those lands and construct this canal. The bill further provides that Congress shall loan to this company $6,000,000 of twenty-year bonds, in consideration for which the company is bound to give to the United States forever the practical ownership of the canal for all military and naval purposes whatever. It also compels the company to open up the canal as a grand highway of commerce at a rate of tolls not to exceed the rate of toll now charged upon the Welland canal through Canada, which upon grain, wheat, and corn, is twenty cents, and upon flour twenty-five cents, per ton.

The bill also provides for a board of revision, to revise and alter the tolls every five years, thereby protecting the commerce of the country. It also provides that the Government may at any time enter upon and purchase this canal from the company, by adding ten per cent. to its actual cost.

The bill has been framed with great care to protect the Government and the commercial interests of the country. No company is yet formed, and the names of no persons are yet decided upon; but if the design of those who have moved in this measure be carried out, the leading commercial men of Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, and of the other lake cities, will be invited to come forward and take this work as trustees or agents of the Government and construct this canal forthwith.

The bill provides that it shall be completed within three years, or the contract shall be forfeited and the work revert to some other company. Lest some objection may be raised to the right of the General Government to build this canal over the lands of the State of New York, I will state that a joint resolution was passed by the Legislature of the State of New York, in these words:

"Resolved, (if the Senate concur.) That the consent of this Legislature is hereby given to the construction, by the Government of the United States, of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, and that the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States be requested to use their best efforts to procure the passage of a bill for this purpose."

The consent, then, of the State of New York has been given to the United States to enter upon and take land for the construction of this great highway.

Now, sir, twenty-five or fifty years hence, from the Atlantic to the Pacific will be a continuous tier of States, members of this Union, and over those States will run the iron horse of the Pacific railroad. Members who reside upon the far western coast have also an interest, then, in this highway. The products of Asia wafted over the Pacific ocean, and then by rail, can be shipped upon the waters of Lake Michigan and pass to the Atlantic by this great improvement, and the merchandise of Philadelphia, of Baltimore, of New York, of Boston, and of Portland, will be sent westward over these waters and will find a way to the coast of the Pacific, and even to China and India for sale and consumption. And not only that, sir; the time is coming, within the next half century, when this Republic will dictate laws, not only in the arts and sciences, but in pecuniary matters, to the whole world. The moneyed center of the world is to be transferred from English to American soil, if we be but true to ourselves and use and develop the resources and advantages bountifully bestowed upon us by nature. England must abandon her lines of communication with her eastern possessions and become tributary to the lines that we propose to construct between the Atlantic and the Pacific. Her business men and emigrants seeking China and India must cross our continent and pay tribute to our enterprise and the genius of our institutions.

BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.

SPEECH OF HON. H. W. DAVIS,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3, 1865.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866, the pending question being the amendments submitted by Mr. Davis, of Maryland, to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That no money appropriated for the naval service shall be expended otherwise than in accordance with the following provision, so far as it is applicable; that is to say, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral and one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer highest in rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the consideration of the subject.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on any matters submitted by him relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war. All such opinions shall be recorded.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any engine for any vessel of war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments decided to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board, from time to time, other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three, at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

MR. DAVIS, of Maryland, said:

MR. CHAIRMAN: I should have been glad, but for the importance of this subject, to have allowed the vote to be taken upon the amendment which I have offered without making any observations on it. But the condition of the Navy, and its great importance in the adjustment of accounts which we will have to adjust with other nations, so soon as this rebellion shall be suppressed, make it a matter of vital moment that we should not be deluded by any apparent strength, that we should not allow weakness to be covered up under great numbers, whether of vessels or of guns, nor allow ourselves to be persuaded, by articles adroitly inserted in newspapers in various portions of the country, into the belief that we are a great naval Power of the first magnitude, till that illusion be dispelled by some

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Davis.

day of disastrous memory. For these reasons I desire to offer a few observations in support of the amendment which I have proposed.

This amendment is not introduced upon my own judgment, is not one hastily drawn and thrown before the House to provoke a discussion; but it was introduced after great deliberation, not deliberation in my own mind, but after deliberation in connection with the first officers of the Navy of the United States, the men who must bear your flag, navigate your ships, fight your guns, and maintain the honor of your country with the means you place at their disposal. They are the men who tremble at the present condition of the Navy.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] on the Naval Committee, was prompt and anxious to thrust aside, unconsidered, this amendment when it was introduced the other day, because it was under consideration before the Naval Committee. But it is proper to say that the bill was referred to the Naval Committee at the last session; not late in the session—three months before its close; and if they have not considered it, it is because they do not wish a vote upon it or do not consider it worthy of consideration. I have more than once applied to one or two of the gentlemen upon that committee to take the bill up and consider it, and to report it, even if they reported unfavorably upon it, so that the country might have an opportunity of having the judgment of this House and the vote of this House upon that measure.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. For a moment.

Mr. SPALDING. I would say that the Naval Committee has considered the bill, and agreed to report unfavorably upon it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then, sir, there is no further reason for delay. Perhaps the House will understand why that report is made now, when it can be no longer delayed. At an earlier stage, as an independent measure, there would have been a chance of having a consideration of the bill. When I saw that there was a purpose that there should be no consideration of it, I moved it as an amendment to the appropriation bill. The Naval Committee were not then ready to express their judgment upon it. Now that it is here, and the House must act upon it, they have suddenly made up their opinions—upon what consideration it is for them to say—and throw the weight of their judgment against it when it is up for consideration before the House. Sir, their judgment will, of course, not have the weight and consideration of a committee under ordinary circumstances; but that they have deliberated for nearly a year without deciding on it, looks as though their opinion were given now for the purpose of accomplishing what they did not accomplish by smothering the bill.

There are, I agree, grave objections to incorporating important measures upon the appropriation bills. But before this amendment was moved the House, by an almost unanimous vote, had greatly changed the organization of the Navy by increasing largely the number of cadets allowed at the Naval Academy. And the objection urged to incorporating this amendment upon the appropriation bill struck me as very remarkable, when an amendment of that kind had already been adopted within half an hour before I made my motion, on the motion of the honorable gentleman now in the chair, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] amended and enlarged upon the motion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. STEVENS.]

There are circumstances where grave and important measures may with propriety be put into an appropriation bill; and while that precedent surely justifies this amendment in point of parliamentary law, there is an additional consideration why this should be incorporated here. The declaration of the gentleman from the Committee on Naval Affairs sufficiently shows that this measure does not meet with favor at the other end of the avenue; that the people whose hands are to be tied by the presence of responsible advisers prefer that the fetters should not be put upon them. And we have experienced more than once in this Congress that measures of national moment, passed unanimously by this House, have rested unacted upon elsewhere. Sir, there is small prospect of securing the passage of any measure which has to be forced upon opponents at the other end of the avenue. It is impossible to get even a vote upon such measures unless they are placed upon bills that put them before the public eye and require a vote either in the affirmative or negative. I avow, sir, that it was not to insure the passage of the amendment, but to compel a vote on it, that I moved it when I did.

Mr. Chairman, we are creating a navy at enormous cost; not increasing a navy; not merely continuing the ordinary expenses of a navy; we are creating one. We are driven to the necessity of passing from a second or a third-rate into the class of a first-rate naval Power; and the question that we have to decide is, under what responsibility, by whose advice, under whose auspices, shall that great change be made? We have now had the experience of four years of war. The changes that have been made have been made under the auspices of the Secretary of the Navy and his irresponsible Assistant Secretary, who is the real and acting Secretary of the Navy, and on the suggestion of the chief of the Bureau of Engineers; and beyond that responsibility there is no responsibility to the people or the country for anything that has been done heretofore or anything that may be done hereafter.

What has been the result? We are taught to believe that we are a great naval Power. We have the semblance certainly; whether we have the reality is something that remains to be seen. We are told by authority that we have 671 vessels-of-war, and that we have 4,610 guns afloat, or for which vessels are being built. If that be so, then we are a great naval Power, though perhaps not of the first class. But, sir, it is important to analyze that statement and see what there is of substance in it—how many guns there are afloat that must go down in the first collision, how many that can bear the flag of the Republic in the face of the force of a great naval Power. When we scan the figures given us by the Department, and analyze in the light of the reports of the Department the origin, structure, and speed of the vessels which bear the guns, and apply to it the judgment of naval men, the laws and conditions which are to be observed in the construction of naval vessels—matters upon which I am not entitled to express an opinion, but on which I may quote the opinion of those who are professionally competent—we find that these figures dwindle to more modest proportions, that the real navy is greatly less than the apparent navy of the report.

The aggregate given by the Secretary's report is 651 vessels, with 4,610 guns. But there are 112 sailing vessels, with 850 guns. The Secretary of the Navy tells us that sailing vessels are useless for the purposes of modern war. It is useless, after that authority, to quote any other; for if the Secretary of the Navy knows it, then every midshipman at least knows it, and everybody else in the country. Then 850 guns are to be taken from the apparatus of war of the Navy. We have besides 174 paddle-wheel steamers bought; that is to say, merchant vessels, with all their machinery exposed, so that a single shot subjects them to the fate of the Hatteras, exploded and sunk by the Alabama in the Gulf of Mexico. They are not war vessels, built for naval service, but ordinary mercantile vessels, purchased by the United States for the purposes of the blockade. Now, sir, I do not criticize the propriety of those purchases; on the contrary, I think they were eminently wise when they were made. Whether they were made as economically as possible is a matter that I do not propose to consider. But to place them among the war vessels of the Navy, and to think that those 174 vessels carrying 921 guns are to be accounted part of the naval strength of the United States in the event of a naval war, is a delusion that must result in disaster.

There are, besides, 149 screw vessels, light-propeller vessels, likewise bought from the mercantile marine. Every naval man knows that no vessel constructed for mere mercantile purposes is or can be made a vessel-of-war fit to be placed in line of battle in a great naval struggle. They answer possibly to cruise after the commerce of the enemy. But when the flag of England shall float over a fleet representing in this day that which Nelson commanded at Trafalgar, that nation that meets such a fleet with vessels built for the merchant service is doomed to disaster; and when we have a statement which includes such vessels as a part of the naval strength of the country, no man who values the honor of the country or its safety in a day of naval battle can permit such a statement to pass without saying that it is a delusion and a snare. When you sum up those vessels you find from the aggregate of 671 you have stricken off 435 vessels and 2,385 guns, and left 236 vessels bearing 2,225 guns.

But let us go a step further. There are likewise of the vessels built for naval purposes, under the auspices of the Department, 47 paddle-wheel steamers—double-enders, as they are called—ferry-boats, river steamers, hawks to catch blockade runners; but for a day of naval battle no naval man will allow them to be called war vessels at all. Their machinery is all exposed, their boilers are exposed. Whatever may be their availability for blockade purposes, though they escape a chance shot from a rover, as part of the naval force of the United States they must be stricken from the list, for it is not possible they could survive a collision with vessels of equal armament constructed on naval principles. And we must also deduct five paddle-wheel steamers of the old Navy. These two classes of paddle-wheel steamers carry 524 guns; and if they are deducted from the 2,225 guns, there remain 1,701 guns on 184 vessels-of-war properly so called. So when we have analyzed the real naval force of the country that stands between us and aggression from abroad, we are reduced to the number of 184 vessels and 1,701 guns—a respectable increase, but an increase which leaves us exposed to overwhelming disaster if we stop there; a difference between the official statement and the real condition of the naval force of the Government to which the attention of the people should be called.

In order to give a clearer idea of the real force existing and what has been added by the Department since the rebellion broke out, it is necessary to say that of these 184 vessels, 25 are screw steamers of the old Navy that I guess can sink all the wooden vessels which have been added of the new Navy by the mere weight of their batteries, 62 iron-clads, and 97 wooden vessels, mostly of small size; none at least of large size, none beyond the grade of a sloop-of-war of moderate size, at present afloat, for 28 vessels included in that 97 are, I believe, now upon the stocks, and that 28 include all the larger cruisers mentioned in the Secretary's report. So that our fleet actually afloat is reduced to about 156 vessels, bearing 1,192 guns. And there we stand to-day if we have a declaration of war with England to-morrow.

The organization of the Navy Department, as I have already said, leaves the whole responsibility of the construction of all naval vessels, their forms, structure, armament, machinery, and materials, limited only by the amount of money appropriated for their construction, at the irresponsible discretion of the three persons I have named; for the organization of the Navy Department is a Secretary who administers it, an Assistant Secretary who administers him, and the chiefs of bureaus who are the ministerial fingers and hands of the gentleman at the head of the Navy Department. Such an organization of a Navy Department exists nowhere else in the civilized world among naval Powers. In our fast American style we sneer at the slow motions and grave deliberation that mark every step of the great naval Powers of the world, France and England; yet to-morrow we are unable to cope with either of them with one half of their force in ranged battle on the ocean.

Their organization, Mr. Chairman, is a different one. In England we know that the office of Lord High Admiral is exercised by a board of six commissioners who are called Lords of Admiralty, and a chief Secretary of the Admiralty. The First Lord of the Admiralty is a member of the cabinet, and the Secretary must be a member of the House of Commons, where he is charged with the naval estimates. The powers which are exereised in England by the Board of Admiralty are here exercised by the Secretary of the Navy. The Board of Admiralty in England is charged with the responsible and discretionary administration of the Navy as the Secretary is here; both having ministerial officers under them which with us are called chiefs of bureaus.

The French navy is administered by the minister Secretary of State for the Marine and the Colonies. He is surrounded by a Council of Admiralty composed of three naval officers of high grade, vice or rear admirals, and three high officers of colonial administration, named by the Crown, presided over by the minister, and charged to give its advice on all measures relating to maritime and colonial legislation, the administration of the colonies, the organization of the naval force, the modes of supplying it, naval structures and buildings, and to the direction and employment of the naval force in time of war. This council is intended for advice on the higher matters of legislation and administration. But the minister is provided with another Council of Naval Works composed of the inspector general of naval constructions, the inspector of artillery, the inspectors general of hydraulic constructions, two captains of the navy, a director of naval constructions, and an engineer of the navy, acting as secretary, with a deliberative voice, the whole presided over by one of the Council of Admiralty, and charged to give its advice on matters submitted to it by the minister, on the plans and estimates for naval constructions, hydraulic works, material of artillery, and all works in navy-yards, on the preparation of regulations for the execution of naval works of all kinds, on the preparation of proposals for contracts for any of the above objects, on the adoption of inventions, and everything relating to improvements of naval structures, artillery, or hydraulic works. Thus the minister Secretary of State for the Marine and Colonies, aided by a large naval staff of professional officers for professional advice, is charged with the responsible administration of the French navy. They deliberate in common, constitute the council of the Secretary of the Navy, as we should call him, his cabinet, whose advice is to guide and enlighten the administrative discretion of the minister. It is to the minister, aided by the deliberations of those responsible bodies, that the great duties of creating and employing the French navy is confided.

What I propose is this: that we shall create a Board of Admiralty, adhering to the American idea of the unity of the executive or administrative officer, but surrounding him with responsible advisers, appointed by the President, not depending upon the caprice and will of the Navy Department; men of professional standing, competent ability, and of high and permanent rank, without whose knowledge and advice nothing can be done within the purview of the bill; not that their assent shall be necessary to any order or act, but that no material step shall be taken with reference to the various subjects included in the bill without their advice having been previously taken in writing and spread upon the records of the Department. The general effect of that is, that there can be no such thing as mere improvidence, mere charlatanism, mere ignorance, or the mere application of civil ideas to military matters. We have learned something during this war; we have learned that every man is not born a soldier or a sailor; he may be born a President of the United States, but he is not born with the special knowledge belonging to and required of this Department. What is necessary in order that there shall be a navy created is that there shall be men of competent professional knowledge, who shall advise in a responsible form, authentically, in writing, and if their advice be neglected the responsibility will lie with those who neglect it. The mere existence of such a responsible body of advisers infinitely diminishes the chances of error, or corruption, or ignorance, or plausible and dangerous charlatanism, or rash and improvident conduct. It will be to the Secretary what the Cabinet is to the President—an aid, not a hindrance.

We have repeatedly resorted to temporary boards of this kind; one of them was adopted in 1860 to consider the application of steam to our sailing vessels; another was organized by the Department to devise the plan of blockade; another was organized under a law of Congress for experiments in iron-clads; and another, summoned by the Department, was called to advise upon the engines of the Navy. Others are now, we are informed by the report of the Secretary of the Navy, engaged in investigating various questions respecting steam machinery. But boards of this kind are made pro hac vice, are liable to the particular influences prevailing at the moment; made rather to accomplish a particular purpose than to give independent advice; and if created under the authority of Congress, and therefore of an independent character, they are temporary in their purposes, their influence is not permanent, and the effect of their opinions passes off the moment they are dissolved.

What I propose by the bill is that there shall be a board composed of men of the first responsibility in the Navy, which shall be headed by the vice admiral, who is neither an old fogey nor a charlatan, nor an enemy of the Secretary, but one of the great officers of the Navy, possessing the confidence of the Department, whose opinion they ought to be bound to consult and respect, whom the nation has honored by creating a new title and new grade, whom all the officers of the Navy will cheerfully follow, and constituted of the other officers of designated rank, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to advise the Secretary in all matters relating to naval organization.

While I cannot go into the details of the condition of the Navy Department at this time, I think that the opinion of the naval officers is that it is a failure as a machinery for successful administration. There is no responsibility anywhere to be found; everything is managed by a subordinate in the name of the Secretary, and it is more to that than to any intentional abuse of power or neglect on the part of the Secretary that I attribute the rash empiricism, the scandalous improvidence, and the costly failures which mark the administration of that Department. The way to avoid that is not to howl about them in Congress, but to provide the Secretary with responsible advisers on naval construction and the armament and machinery of vessels, on the organization and location of navy-yards.

The House has been deprived of the services of the Committee on Naval Affairs a large portion of the last year while they were engaged in investigations to advise the Navy Department on the selection of a navy-yard for iron-clads—a matter which, while they were competent to determine, I submit any one single experienced officer of the Navy was more competent to determine. And when my friend, the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] before me, who accompanied them on one trip, was a little sensitive at my suggestions of such superiority, he could not refuse his assent to my avowal that I would take with more confidence the opinion of his distinguished brother of the Navy than his own upon that subject. I think if there had been a board of competent advisers to the Secretary of the Navy on the topics embraced in the second section of this bill, that there are some expeditions that would not have been undertaken by the Navy Department; I think the nation would have been saved from some failures; and I think some successes would have been followed up, and the fruits of victory reaped which to this day are barren. I think half a dozen rebel cruisers could not have swept our commerce from the ocean, driven it to take refuge under foreign flags, and destroyed many millions of property and lighted every sea with the conflagration of our ships for three years with absolute impunity, had any body of competent naval officers been invited to devise a systematic plan for their pursuit and capture. I think that the great day at Port Royal would have produced something more than a secure foothold for the boats of the blockading squadron. With proper advice around the Secretary when Savannah and Charleston were exposed half armed, that blow would have been followed up by others which should have reduced those places; we should have been spared the humiliation of a fruitless bombardment before Charleston for a year and a half, a bombardment utterly ineffec-ive, leaving the rebel fortifications there to-day as absolutely beyond the reach of our naval forces there as they were before Gillmore battered Sumter. It would not have been left for Sherman and his army, after three or four years of war in the West, to march across the continent and take Savannah, but it would have been taken long ago by forces actually there. But without any competent advisers, the Navy Department rested upon the laurels of Port Royal, and left it barren to the nation beyond the immediate result. I think if the head of the Department had had proper advisers there would have been no such thing as an attack upon three hundred guns in Charleston harbor by thirty-six guns, if any naval opinions, good or bad, retired or active, had been listened to or even asked in the Navy Department. It would not have been reserved to the Department to vindicate naval opinion and condemn its own rash presumption on that occasion by sending four hundred and fifty guns to batter Fort Fisher with its fifty or sixty guns, after sending thirty-six guns to tear in pieces the enormous fortifications of Charleston bristling with three hundred guns. One or the other is an unspeakable folly; and history has already declared which.

But what I wish more particularly to remark upon is what has been accomplished by the Navy Department. Where are we now, and how did we get there? I desire that it should be borne in mind that I am not now seeking to cast imputations upon any one, to show his incompetency, but to expose the evils of a merely personal and irresponsible administration of the Department, and to demonstrate the necessity of a remedy. I make no suggestions for which I do not propose an adequate remedy. I state the failure that gentlemen may be enabled to judge of the propriety of the remedy. If they can say that a lack of advice does not exist, then let them say so. But if they admit that there is that lack, and admit the results, then give me a judgment upon my remedy.

The first great thing that we are called upon to deal with is the subject of iron-clads. Congress was conscious that it was going into a new department of naval expenditure. But it failed in the drawing of the act which it passed upon that subject. It created a board of skilled and eminent naval officers, and upon their advice the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to cause one or more iron-clads to be built. That board, of which Admiral Charles Davis, of Boston, was the scientific head, met and advised the construction, upon a consideration of multifarious plans, of one of each of three types of vessels, which are now known to history as the Galena, the Ironsides, and the Monitor. They were constructed merely as experiments, their value to be subsequently determined; to be determined, I take it, not by acts of Congress, not by the irresponsible and unscientific judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, however honest, respectable, and praiseworthy, but by competent men to advise after the idea had been embodied in a vessel-of-war, and was ready to be tried, or had been tried in action.

Now, what were the facts? Had the board which I propose been in existence we could not have been suffering as we now are from the neglect of those precautions. How came it that the monitors which we know now to be failures were multiplied, while the Department neglected the Ironsides, the only one of all the iron-clad vessels, with perhaps one doubtful exception, that has met the approval of naval officers?

The Monitor accidentally came into Hampton Roads as the Merrimac was trying to destroy, as it had already destroyed, some of our vessels. A collision took place. Neither party was destroyed; neither vessel was sunk; neither party was whipped, as the boys said; and the country ran wild over two guns in a cheese-box on a raft, not having done anything, and not having been defeated. People forgot that our vessels were either sailing vessels at anchor or steamers which had run aground in the narrow channel; that the Merrimac drew more water than they and could not reach them, and was no stronger than the Minnesota, her duplicate, and therefore weaker when burdened by her armor, and liable to be run down by our steamers when afloat, and beyond reach of the Merrimac when aground. And upon the simple fact that the Monitor and Merrimac exchanged shots and did not sink, without consultation with one single naval officer anywhere, without the judgment of any one professional man upon the floating or the fighting qualities of this class of vessels, without any additional consideration except that the Department tells us it had been well persuaded in its own mind beforehand by the spirit of prophecy that that type of iron-clad was to be successful, and had proved itself successful, the Secretary orders twenty of them at a cost of from four hundred thousand to four hundred and sixty thousand dollars each, amounting to $9,200,000. This was done upon the fight between the Monitor and the Merrimac, and no other consideration whatever. So the Department tells you in its report.

From that day to this monitors have been a gold mine for iron contractors, and to doubt their perfect success is as much as any naval officer's chances of command or promotion are worth.

That is the consideration that was given to this great topic, on an accidental collision between one vessel and another, without any of its scientific bearings having been adjudged and considered by competent officers; $9,200,000 were spent in constructing upon that type, without any material change, twenty vessels of that character. And so closely did they stick to the model that one of the most distinguished officers of the Navy, who now enjoys the highest consideration of the Navy Department, told me that he had to battle day after day with Ericsson and the men who were building them to get them to put upon those vessels the most ordinary naval appliances to fit them to be used at all in Charleston harbor.

Following up that, the Department proceeded likewise, without any naval advice or investigation, to order the Dictator and the Puritan, under the authority of Congress, which improvidently left everything to the Department and the contractors and speculators, at a cost of $2,300,000. Each monitor was to carry about two guns, which would make each gun cost about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The Dictator and the Puritan were to carry, I think, the former about two, the latter four guns, which would make the cost of each gun of the Dictator $575,000, and of each gun of the Puritan $287,500. Then they ordered the Dunderberg, not yet completed, but on the plan of the casemated batteries of the rebels, likely to be more formidable than the vessels on the monitor principle, for she will have a battery of ten guns. So that just at one breath, by one stroke of the pen, the Department expended in this type of vessels, without any other consideration or advice whatever, $13,000,000. I submit, sir, that after the resolution of this House, passed last year, to make additional compensation to the constructors of the Dictator and Puritan in addition to the enormous contract already made with them, the honor and dignity of the country required that more consideration should have been given, more scientific advice should have been asked, before such enormous sums were expended in forms so totally new, which no experience had then justified, which no naval opinion had then advised, and which no naval opinion at this day now advises.

Then, sir, there were others built, I suppose, at the navy-yards. I do not see any details respecting them in the reports, and I cannot speak in regard to them. That, sir, was the work of 1862, as the Department informed us.

In 1863, when the additional monitors were ordered, to which I am now going to refer, there had been no trial of the original monitor, excepting that one accidental and partial experiment in Hampton Roads, in smooth waters, of a drawn battle, and excepting the failure on the Ogechee to silence a land battery that mounted four guns, and the experience of the attack in Charleston harbor on the 7th of April, 1863, when one half of the monitor force was silenced in forty minutes. On that discouraging experience, listen to the Secretary's account of new contracts for more monitors:

"The pressure for iron-clads of light draught, which could ascend the rivers and penetrate the sounds and bays along our coast, was felt to be a necessity."

That is, the pressure was felt to be a necessity.

Well, so it was. The pressure of iron contractors, I take it, not of naval officers.

The Secretary proceeds:

"The operations of our armies in the vicinity of the inland water and adjacent to the rivers required the constant presence of gunboats. But the men thus employed, as well as the magazines and machinery of the vessels are exposed, especially in the narrow streams with high and wooded banks. Some vessels, and not a few valuable lives, have been lost by these exposures, and in order to afford all possible protection to the gallant men who encounter these dangers, the Department considered it a duty to provide armored vessels of light draught for their security. Contracts were entered into for the construction of twenty vessels on the monitor principle, each to carry two eleven-inch guns in order to be efficient, and to draw but seven feet of water."

Now, contracts for those vessels were made in the course of 1863, from March to August. They cost from $386,000 to $395,000 each vessel, amounting in the aggregate to $7,800,000! Upon what advice? Upon whose opinion? Upon what consideration? Upon what specification? Upon what calculation? To accomplish what purpose? Let the gentlemen who represent the Department answer. So carelessly, so absolutely without scientific consideration, that the Department has been forced in its report at this session to confess and smooth over its failure in the construction of vessels—utter, absolute, ridiculous, disgraceful—a failure, Mr. Chairman, which is inexcusable, because, irrespective of the naval or fighting qualities of a vessel, the weight of iron, the weight of water, the ratio of displacement, and exactly how the vessel will float, when dimensions and material are given, is a question of mathematical and physical research, settled for centuries, that no school-boy would hesitate at if the conditions of the problem were placed before him. Yet, so carelessly were these vessels, at those enormous sums, ordered, that there was an absolute failure of the whole fleet. All of them had to be materially altered. Some nearly sank when they were launched, and I learn had to be shored up with barrels in the harbor, before the workmen would go on them in order to complete them. One at Pittsburg sank, went straight to the bottom when launched. But I do not pretend to presume accuracy in these things. These are the rumors. But here is the official confession of the failure, which is more than enough. The Secretary tells us: "It was ascertained, however, when the first two approached completion, that their draught of water was more than was intended." Had the weight of water changed, or the weight of iron, or had the laws of arithmetic changed? Was the calculation proved to be false after it was made? Or indeed was there any calculation? Did Mr. Fox sit in his office, and when a man came in with the model of a monitor of light draught and heavy cost, ask him, How much water will that draw? So much. How much will it weigh? So much. Then build me that thing. Is that administration in time of war and debt and danger?

The report says:

"The heavy armor and the two eleven-inch guns, with the machinery to give them proper speed, involved the necessity of enlarging the capacity of each of them."

There was another question of arithmetic, and of the twenty not one could carry their machinery or their guns. Who devised their machinery? I suppose the head of the engineering department. Who advised the form, capacity, or weight of the monitors? It is nobody, or Mr. Fox.

"When making these necessary alterations, it was deemed advisable, under applications from some of the commanders of squadrons for boats that should present but a small rise above the surface of the water, to dispense with the turrets in five of these light-draught vessels, with a view to special operations. The remaining fifteen were ordered to be enlarged by raising their decks, thereby giving them additional tonnage and greater draught and making them more efficient, but in other respects carrying out the original design. This work is now being performed, and most of the vessels are near completion."

So the Secretary informs us that he dispensed with the turrets upon five of the light-draught vessels. Why? Because with the turrets they were not light draughts. The only thing in which the monitor differs from an iron box is this revolving turret, and when the turrets were taken away they failed to be monitors at all. Yet the monitor price was paid, with a large addition to cover the official blunder. The remaining fifteen were ordered to be enlarged to make them draw less water! Their decks were raised in order to give them additional tonnage—an official euphuism, raising them above the water in spite of their original weight. They had too much draught before, and they would not float unless they had more cubic contents to buoy them up! The Department wanted light draughts, not heavy draughts. Those built before were too heavy to get into shoal waters. The Secretary says that in all other respects the original design is being carried out—they have only been made more efficient. But the original design was for light-draught monitors and nothing else; yet the light draught has been abandoned on all for heavier draught, which excludes them from answering the original design wholly; and on five the turret is gone—so they are neither monitors nor light-draughts! What part of the original design remains but to give $7,000,000 to iron contractors to be invested in worthless iron? If there was any consideration on that subject, if any advice was taken, the officer who gave it ought to be cashiered. If there was no consideration, no professional advice asked, I leave it to the judgment of the Naval Committee what judgment should be pronounced upon the Department.

We come next to the consideration of the sea-going iron-clads, because even the Secretary of the Navy will not submit to allow American genius to be chained to our own coast. For that purpose we are told by the Department—I beg to be understood that I am using official information obtained from official documents, and nothing else—we are told by the Department that they wanted two swift sea-going iron-clads that should be able to cross the ocean and dictate the law abroad; and therefore one was called the Dictator, and the other was called the Puritan—a singular mingling of the religious and warlike element, I suppose in memory of the great Puritan Dictator. But when he dictated, it was to kings on the field of battle; but the things they have made here, and marked with the names of power, will dictate nowhere except at the bottom of the ocean. The two were to cost $2,300,000. I think the Dictator was to carry two guns of enormous caliber, and the Puritan four, I think. Divide and you will find what each gun costs. They are to go to sea. Sir, the Dictator cannot carry more than six days' supply of coal with her armament, ammunition, and necessary provisions for ten, without going to the bottom. She cannot steam ten knots an hour. "Swift to pursue the enemy!" Why, sir, she cannot go over six miles an hour, I believe, burning fifty-four tons of coal a day at that; for that, I am told, has been proved by the result of her trip from New York to Fortress Monroe. But in this matter I am outside of the record and official information.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman give me his authority?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I prefer not to mention names. I make this statement upon what I suppose to be good authority; the log of the Dictator can correct it if erroneous. She started from New York to join in the attack on Fort Fisher. I have not official authority for saying, but I think it will not be controverted, that she did not go there because her machinery broke down in going from New York to Fortress Monroe, and I understand she is detained there undergoing material repairs. Then that is not a sea-going iron-clad, nor a swift iron-clad, nor one available for offensive war. However destructive she may be if the enemy consult her convenience by taking position within her range, yet the swiftest vessel has the choice of field, and the enemy will not stay within her range unless it is to close on and board her, or to shut up her port-holes by rapid and concentrated and continuous fire which will prevent her using the enormous shots which go once in seven or eight minutes, or crush her thin decks with shot as heavy as her own.

But these are matters for Navy men to settle; all that is now known is that the Dictator is as useless for a sea-going vessel-of-war as the light-draught monitors are to go in shallow water.

A moment as to the providence with which the contract was made. I remember to have heard—and the records of the Department will correct me if I am not correctly informed—there were claims made for extra compensation on those two vessels, and a board was summoned, consisting of officers whose names I will not mention. I do not know how much, but perhaps two hundred thousand dollars were demanded. The board declined to recommend it. Another board was summoned of more pliant material, and they recommended the allowance not only of what was asked but greatly more; and if I am not misinformed—and here again I am speaking outside of the record—the award was so much beyond what was asked that application was made, formal and informal, to withdraw the original application. The Secretary of the Navy shrank from acting under the advice of such a board. The claimants then came here to Congress, and Congress at its last session, upon the motion of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Rice,] passed a resolution making material additions to the compensation awarded; how much, nobody knows. The result has been that the Puritan remains, I believe, upon the stocks, uncompleted, and nobody knows when, if ever, she will be completed. The Dictator lies with her machinery broken on her first trip from New York to Fortress Monroe.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Davis.

Such is the investment of the Department in sea-going iron-clads, and there it stops. When the Dunderberg comes out we shall know more about her; but she is not of the monitor class. Her engines are not of bureau device, but by the builders; she will bear ten guns, and may be a powerful floating battery, hardly anything more. We are without a single sea-going iron-clad capable of cruising alone, the Ironsides alone excepted.

Now, sir, to what purpose are these vessels of the monitor type adapted? They have no ram. Their engines are so weak that in collision they can do no harm. Their draught is eleven and a half feet, perhaps twelve, instead of ten. They have no sails; they cannot attack; they cannot escape if attacked; they cannot batter forts with any success; they have never yet silenced a sand-battery or shaken a stone of a casemated fort, anywhere, at any time. It does not appear that, in the course of a year's operations before Charleston, any impression has been made there upon any fortification of any kind. At Fort McAllister, the rebel officers mounted the ramparts and smoked their cigars between the shots. They cannot stand heavy and continuous battering, for, though the turret be not pierced, their machinery for turning the turret, closing the ports, and working the guns, is so delicate as to deprive them of half their fire by constant derangement; and if a line-of-battle ship has half her guns silenced it is supposed she is materially damaged in the conflict, though hull and engine survive. Of the seven monitors that went into action in Charleston harbor, four of them were partially or wholly disabled in forty minutes. That is a proportion of loss that Trafalgar did not show.

Safe? Why, sir, their liability to sink, whether from a tornado or the storms of the ocean, when going down the coast, is more fatal to life than an ordinary general action. Two or three of them, including the original Monitor itself, have already sunk, out of the twenty that have been built and launched, carrying down nearly all the crews. One went down in perfectly quiet water in Charleston harbor, carrying thirty men with her; one nearly sank lying at the Washington navy-yard; the original Monitor went down on its way to Port Royal; one was sunk the other day by a torpedo in Charleston harbor, and carried down some seventy men, it is said; and the Tecumseh sunk in the action at Mobile, burying Craven and all but three or four of her crew. The unpublished health reports exhibit disastrous and unprecedented results. The ratio of loss, taking the liability to sickness, the chances of sinking, together with the chances of losses in action, shows that they were no safer, and less effective in fight, than ordinary wooden vessels. And everybody will appreciate the remark of Admiral Porter when he intimates that he had rather stand behind his wooden walls and take what comes, than be confined in one of these iron coffins. And it is remarkable that this class of vessels have nowhere received, and cannot now get, the suffrages of any respectable proportion of the American Navy as any form of national defense at all, unless it be behind obstructions across the entrance of a port where they cannot be reached; and casemated batteries, with numerous and equally heavy guns, not costing $250,000 a gun, can do that duty with equal effect. And any one who will read, what I have not now time to read, the special report of Admiral Porter on these vessels at Fort Fisher, will find that, while he complacently decorates them with words of vague eulogy, yet his criticism leaves them nothing of peculiar value, and his consent could never be gotten to build another monitor. The single exception is the Monadnock, whose sailing qualities he speaks highly of; but her engines were not built under the auspices of the Navy Department. He did not venture to put the ammunition on board these vessels before they started; he did not venture to put their coal on board; but they towed every one of them down the coast to Beaufort, and when they got there their ammunition and coal were placed on them for the first time. And any one who will compare the results in Mobile Bay with the results at Fort Fisher will find that the effective instruments in each case were the broadside vessels, with their concentrated and rapid fire, covering the whole field of battle with their shells, rendering it untenable to any one; while, as I have already mentioned, when the monitors alone were engaged at Fort McAllister, the officers did not hesitate to stand upon the ramparts and smoke their cigars between the shots. Admiral Farragut is entitled to be heard upon the question of naval armament, and he did not ascribe any decisive influence on the result at Mobile, one of the great days of our Republic, to our iron-clads. He did not think that the monitors defeated the enemy in that conflict, the most serious conflict between vessels during the rebellion. Hear his report:

"Our iron-clads, from their slow speed and bad steering, had some difficulty in getting into and maintaining their position in line as we passed the fort, and, in the subsequent encounter with the Tennessee, from the same causes were not as effective as could have been desired; but I cannot give too much praise to Lieutenant Commander Perkins, who, though he had orders from the Department to return North, volunteered to take command of the Chickasaw, and did his duty nobly.

"The Winnebago was commanded by Commander T. H. Stevens, who volunteered for that position. His vessel steers very badly, and neither of his turrets will work, which compelled him to turn his vessel every time to get a shot, so that he could not fire very often; but he did the best under the circumstances.

"The Manhattan appeared to work well, though she moved slowly. Commander Nicholson delivered his fire deliberately, and, as before stated, with one of his fifteen-inch shot broke through the armor of the Tennessee, with its wooden backing, though the shot itself did not enter the vessel. No other shot broke through the armor, though many of her plates were started, and several of her port-stoppers jammed by the fire from the different ships."

That is not my judgment nor the judgment of an officer at war with the Department, but the judgment of an officer whose name in history will rest on that day. It is not magnanimous to depreciate the merits and power of the vessels and arms which did his work; and he could not have penned that report if the monitors were the dominant power in the battle. He was on board his wooden vessel with his other wooden vessels, their rapid and powerful batteries converging on the Tennessee from every quarter and silencing her fire, and their rapid rush, or, as a gentleman very appropriately said, the mobbing of the Tennessee by the wooden vessels, which determined the contest, and not the slow, unmoving, helpless, powerless monitors that were there to look on at a battle in which they barely participated. The same thing has been experienced elsewhere; but I quote Admiral Farragut because his testimony is in print, and because there can be no question as to its meaning; because everybody knows that he is a naval man, and one who would make use of every means placed in his hands and fairly distribute the merits of the result.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move that the gentleman from Maryland have leave to proceed and conclude his remarks.

Mr. PIKE. With the understanding that there shall be ample time to reply.

Several MEMBERS. Of course.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to allowing the gentleman from Maryland to proceed? There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have ever accepted a courtesy of this kind at the hands of the House; and I do it now with very great reluctance, and only because there are one or two other things which I desire to state as intelligibly as I can—not, as I said before, for the purpose of casting imputations upon anybody, but to show where the evil is, and to endeavor to find the remedy.

Again, at Fort Fisher monitors mingled their fire with the heavy fire of broadside vessels; and none is so competent to speak of the value of the monitor as Admiral Porter. He says:

"Compared with the Ironsides, their fire is very slow and not at all calculated to silence heavy batteries, which requires a rapid and continuous fire to drive men from their guns; but they are famous conductors in a fight!"

Why, certainly, anything will help upon a pinch—

"and put in heavy blows which tell on casemates and bomb-proofs."

But they never yet destroyed a bomb-proof or tore to pieces a casemate! After a bombardment of two days at Fort Fisher, when it is said all the guns were dismounted, and the work torn to pieces, twenty-five hundred men with whole skins rose from beneath the ruins ready to dispute the possession of that fort, and held it during five hours of hand-to-hand conflict with the army led by the heroic Terry.

If that were all the effect of four hundred and fifty guns of the whole fleet, how much is to be ascribed to the ten guns of the monitors? And how much was effected by the first bombardment of two or three days with the same enormous force, if so soon the fort was ready for defense?

But Admiral Porter proceeds:

"The smaller class of monitors, as at present constructed, will always require the aid of a steamer to tow them and take care of them. In smooth weather they ought to go along by themselves, and when towed the tow rope should never be less than two hundred fathoms in length. It strains them very much to have a short tow-line."

Then he thinks them worthless as sea vessels, incapable of independent action as at present constructed; that is, as monitors built at the cost of $250,000 a gun!

He proceeds:

"I do not know yet what their real durability is or would be in a continuous fire against their turrets. Solid eleven-inch or two hundred-pounder rifles are apt to break something when they strike, and I should be much better satisfied myself to be behind wooden bulwarks and take what comes, than to be shut up in an iron turret, not knowing whether it is properly constructed. This, though, is the prejudice of a sailor, and should have no weight whatever."

So he thinks not much more of their defensive than of their aggressive qualities, and prefers the risk with the power of broadside vessels. That is the naval opinion, not my judgment, upon the monitors at Fort Fisher.

The Monadnock, a turreted vessel, but not a monitor, alone attracted Porter's good opinion:

"As to the Monadnock, she could ride out a gale at anchor in the Atlantic ocean. She is certainly a most perfect success so far as the hull and machinery are concerned, and is only defective in some minor details, which in the building of these vessels require the superintendence of a thorough seaman, and a practical and ingenious man. The Monadnock is capable of crossing the ocean alone, (when her compasses are once adjusted properly,) and could destroy any vessel in the French or British navy, lay their towns under contribution, and return again (provided she could pick up coal) without fear of being followed."

But her speed is no merit of the Department, for her engines were not on their plans. If she could work such wonders abroad, why not try her on Charleston? And the coal question seems to interpose an insuperable barrier to transatlantic exploits, unless she is to remain there.

The admiral turns to the Ironsides:

"I have never yet seen a vessel that comes up to my ideas of what is required for effective operations as much as the Ironsides. The most important is the comfort with which the people on board of her live, though she would be no match for the Monadnock in a fight, the latter having more speed.

"The accuracy of fire is, I think, in favor of the Ironsides, judging from what I have seen here. The turrets get filled with smoke, and do not clear as quick as the Ironsides, though that defect could be avoided by not firing both guns so near together."

Yet this class of vessels, of which the Department have, I believe, but one, which was built upon the recommendation of the original commission, has not been multiplied. They propose to build no more. She can go abroad; she can make her cannon heard on the shores of Great Britain; she can sail as well as steam; and she can carry coal enough to enable her to steam to any extent that may be necessary for the success of her operations. She cost only $780,000, just $80,000 above what the Department paid for a single engine in 1863.

Now, sir, it is material to observe that as the judgment of a Navy man upon this iron-clad, the Ironsides. It was one built upon the advice of naval men. She is one that has not been repeated. She is the one that has not been accepted by the Department. Why? No one can tell, unless it be that the Navy Department had gone crazy on monitors, and was so deeply engaged in their construction that no money or thought remained for anything else. Can any one doubt but that others of the Ironsides class would have been built if naval men had been consulted?

Now, sir, I pass from that to the other question, on which I have something to say. I cannot say as much upon this as I desire. I come to the great question of machinery; no corruption in contracts—nothing of the kind—but to the responsible advice on which the existing machinery of the Navy has been made; simply as a business transaction, treating it as a question of prudence and common sense in the administration of the Government. We have twenty-three screw gunboats of the Unadilla class, twelve double-enders of the Miami class, ten of the Juniata class, twenty seven double-enders of the Eutaw class, and one or two other vessels made of iron, and I believe likewise of the double-ender class, whose machinery was built on the plans and designs of the Bureau of Engineering; so the head of the bureau tells us in his report. There are likewise four other vessels built by the Department, the Oneida, the Tuscarora, Wachusett, and Kearsarge, duplicates of the Iroquois, the Mohican, the Wyoming, and the Seminole. Their machinery was not devised by the Bureau of Steam Engineering, but was copied from the machinery of the other four vessels of which they were duplicates, and on principles which the Department discarded in the machinery designed by the bureau, and placed in its vessels of the four classes above enumerated.

In the course of the year 1862, as the screw sloops of the Juniata class and the paddle-wheel double-enders were being completed and put afloat, a serious question arose as to the efficiency and durability of machinery. The Department summoned a board of the first engineers of the United States to take their opinion on what the Department had done without the advice of anybody. That body was requested to convene and investigate the machinery of the screw steamers Juniata, Monongahela, and Lackawanna class, and of the paddle-wheel steamers then building, and report to the Department upon a series of questions. That report was made, printed, and a copy of it has been handed to me. Now, the first thing to be observed is, that on page 69 of that report, this commission of civil engineers summoned by the Secretary of the Navy to judge his machinery, say the ability to propel naval vessels of proper model at a high rate of speed is an essential point in designing the machinery, and not less than twelve knots per hour for screw vessels should be attainable on emergencies, under favorable circumstances at sea. They then proceed to give their opinion upon the machinery. I will read for the instruction of the committee a few passages, to show how great was the divergency of judgment between the engineers selected by the Department and the engineer officers who constructed the machinery, at a cost of $1,000,000, which now renders our naval vessels in point of speed the laughing stock of every blockade runner. They say:

"Interrogatories.

"1. On the valve gear, whether it admits of using the steam with such degree of expansion as is usual and desirable with marine engines for the naval service, and whether it is a proper one for screw and paddle-wheel engines, as the case may be?

"In reply to the first interrogatory, we separate our opinions in relation to the screw and paddle-wheel engines. For the screw engines it is considered by the board (with the exception of two members named hereafter) that the principle adopted in admitting and exhausting steam by one slide-valve, actuated by the link motion, though not deemed the best in all cases, is, all things considered, proper in the present case, combining simplicity of construction with such a range of expansion as is usual or desirable in the naval service. But the use of very large steam ports, so much in excess of the proportions adopted by the best builders, while, by permitting a free exhaust, it may afford a slight advantage, has involved a serious loss of steam, in our opinion overbalancing such an advantage. It has also entailed all the evils of great travel of valve, namely, difficulty of reversing, increased friction and wear, and a system of gear to work it of excessive size, weight, and cost, both in construction and maintenance.

"For the paddle-wheel steamers, it is believed that, although it would have been better to have adopted a form of valve gear having an arrangement for adjusting while in motion, yet that the principle adopted must be considered a proper one for the purpose, since the admitting and exhausting of the steam are accomplished by different valves and different movements; which in the use of slowly reciprocating engines for marine purposes is very desirable. It is also believed that little if any loss of fuel will result from controlling the engine by the throttle in those cases of emergency when it is ordinarily deemed proper to quickly alter the rate of expansion. We are, however, compelled to object in this case, as in the other, to the great and unnecessary size of ports used, much in excess of that which in our judgment is requisite; entailing, as it does, a great loss of steam as well as additional expense of construction.

"2. On the boilers, whether they are superior, equal, or inferior to others in use, in compactness, durability, efficiency, and proper adaptation to the conditions of the naval service?"

"1. In regard to compactness; to obtain an equal amount of evaporation under ordinary circumstances, the boiler used in the steamers under consideration is inferior to the horizontal tubular boiler, requiring about ten percent. more cubic space. 2. In regard to durability. We regard the boiler used in these steamers as equal in this respect to the horizontal tubular boiler, proper care and attention being bestowed in each case. 3. In regard to efficiency, including economical effect and evaporative power, with natural draught. In the former particular, economy, taking all the conditions of the use of naval boilers into consideration, we think the vertical tubular boiler used in these steamers is equal to the horizontal tubular. A further note on this subject, by five of the members, will be found in a subsequent part of the report. As to the second particular, namely, evaporative power under natural draught, irrespective of economical effect, the vertical tubular is inferior to the horizontal tubular boiler, requiring one third more cubic contents to produce the same amount of steam. 4. In regard to accessibility for cleaning and repair. In this respect, taking into consideration the liability to derangement from carelessness, and the facilities for cleaning fire and water spaces, and for effective repairs, both at sea and in port, we consider the vertical water tube boiler in use in these steamers as, upon the whole, inferior to the horizontal tubular boiler. 5. Power of producing large evaporation with least sacrifice of economical effect, by artificial means. In this respect we consider the vertical tubular as inferior to the horizontal tubular boiler. The former is in this respect open to serious objections. It requires the use of artificial means to produce an evaporation which is ordinarily obtained with ease in the horizontal tubular; and when these means are employed for any length of time, the fire spaces become clogged.

"We reply, therefore, to your second interrogatory, that, on the whole, we are compelled to consider the type of boiler used in these steamers as inferior to the horizontal tubular boiler which is generally used by other nations, and by this country in the mercantile marine."

"4. On the general design and arrangement of the machinery in the different cases, and whether on the whole, all the conditions of the naval service being duly considered, there is any other arrangement in use that would give superior results.

"In reply to this interrogatory we have to report that the general design and arrangement of the machinery for the screw steamers is inferior to that of other types in use in the following particulars: 1. Compactness. It occupies more cubic space than either the ordinary back-acting engine, (this phrase objected to by Mr. Everett,) or the direct-acting engine; either of which, with the same stroke, could have been gotten into these vessels. 2. Liability to derangement. It is more liable to derangement than either of those types, owing to the greater number and weight of the moving parts, and consequent inaccessibility of some of them. 3. In reference to economy of fuel. The consumption of steam as applied to the propulsion of the vessel, must be proportionally greater in these engines than in those of ordinary proportions, owing to the excessive weight of the reciprocating parts to be put in motion at each alternation of movement, involving additional friction, and also to the employment of such large steam ports, involving loss of steam even after allowing for the gain by free exhaust so obtained, and friction of the valves. 4. Owing to the peculiar arrangement of the smaller pumps and of the valve gearing, they are more inaccessible for care and adjustment when in motion and for repairs either at sea or in port. Taking all these points into consideration, we believe, first, that the direct acting engine presents the greatest number and amount of advantages for marine service in the Navy; and can state that the space allotted for the machinery in these vessels would have permitted the introduction of the direct acting engine in place of that adopted, having the same stroke of piston, a sufficient length of connecting rod, and ample surface in the journals to bear the same maximum strain brought upon the reciprocating parts without sacrificing any of the essential elements of a successful performance; second, that the saving of cubic contents occupied in the vessel, due to such change of type, would have been not less than twenty per cent.; and third, that the employment of the proportions used by the best practice for the various parts of these engines would have resulted in a saving of weight amounting to not less than sixty tons, involving reduced cost, other conditions being the same.

"With regard to the paddle-wheel engines, we consider the general plan adopted as not open to serious objection, inasmuch as the space to be occupied in these vessels is of secondary importance. It affords the necessary accessibility for care and adjustment during operation, and for repairs at all times. It is not peculiarly liable to derangement, and has superabundant journal surface. We object, however, to the weight of some of the parts of the engine proper, which, judged by the proportions used in the best practice, is excessive. This objection applies especially to the first paddle-wheel boats. In both classes, however, it is believed to be of importance, as involving additional displacement to carry it and increased cost of construction. We object also to the large proportions of the condensing apparatus (except the condensers proper in the second class of engines) as being in our opinion unnecessary, and to the size of steam ports, valves, &c., about double that of the best practice hitherto, on account of the loss of steam caused thereby. The overhanging wheels and their construction are approved. We approve also of the adoption of single engines for vessels of this class.

"5. Whether, had the drawings and specifications of this machinery been submitted to you before their construction, you would have objected to anything in it as likely to render its performance in any way inferior to other machinery in use, for the same purpose and under the same conditions.

"We should have objected to many of the points of arrangement and detail in these plans and specifications, as giving results inferior to what might in our opinion have been obtained had changes been made in them.

"6. You will please also give, in the event of your disapproving of all or any part of the machinery, the reasons therefor; and state what, in your opinion, it should have been.

"In compliance with this request we have to state that we should have placed more power, both of engines and boilers, in the screw steamers, recognizing the great importance to naval steamers of having the capability to maintain continuously a high rate of speed when desired; and believe that in both respects the power could have been proportionately increased by a change in type and detail—as indicated in previous replies—to the extent of at least one third more, without adding to the space occupied by the whole, reducing the coal space, or equaling the total weight.

"By such a change, obtained without sacrifice of room or displacement, a higher rate of speed would have been attainable; while in ordinary cruising, both engines and boilers could have been worked at a less pressure of steam and managed in a manner most conducive to economy of fuel and their greater durability.

"We should also have objected to certain points of detail and proportion, as indicated in our replies to previous interrogatories. A further objection and proposed change is submitted by four members of the board, in a subsequent part of this report."

"Objections to answer the first interrogatory by Messrs. Coryell and Wright, who object to so much of the foregoing answer as relates to the principle adopted for the valve gear used in the Juniata class of engines, for the reason that it will not allow of the proper motion of the steam valve for an engine working expansively, in combination with a proper opening of ports for the exhaust; in other words, all engines should have a separate valve and motion for working steam expansively. The type of valve motion used on the Iroquois, Wachusett, and vessels of that class, though not combining everything desired for an efficient expansive gear, is in every respect superior to that in use in the Juniata class of engines."

"Addition to answer to sixth interrogatory by Messrs. Hibbard, Wright, Loring, and Coryell; who add to the foregoing answer by stating that they regard the diameter of the cylinders of the Juniata class of engines as too small to develop in the most economical manner the power of the steam that can be generated by the boilers, as they require the steam to be admitted at a pressure of thirty to thirty five pounds per square inch above the atmosphere for about three fourths of the stroke, to develop their ordinary full working power. With larger cylinders, say fifty-four inches in diameter, cutting off the steam at about three eighths the stroke, and using the same pressure and volume of steam, would in their opinion develop more power from it, and at the same time, by cutting off at a longer point, enable the engines to work for a limited time with a large excess of power in an emergency, or at full power with a lower pressure of steam, as would be very desirable in case the boilers were weakened by wear or other causes, or if the pressure of the steam became accidentally lower, or if from leaking or other derangement of the fresh-water condenser it became necessary to work the boilers with salt water, and that such increased size of the cylinders would not materially increase the cubic space occupied. The size of cylinders used do not in our opinion permit the best rate of expansion that the valve gear will give, except at a low rate of speed of the vessels."

"It is true that the best screw vessels in the Navy for speed and efficiency are provided with an independent cut-off apparatus; but this superiority is not necessarily due to the use of an independent cut-off. We believe there are no vessels built for the Navy before the date mentioned (1861) without an independent cut-off."

Then we have on page 127 of the supplemental report, this remark of the board:

"We did not, for example, in our report allude to any

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Davis.

disadvantage of the form of boiler now used in the naval service, although it was fully discussed, namely, the impossibility in the gunboats or sloops, of reducing its height so that the crown of the boiler can be below the main load water-line of the vessel. This can be done by other forms of multitubular boiler, either horizontal or vertical, while the ordinary horizontal tubular occupies somewhat less height, when properly designed, to give the same effect."

Now, the effect of having machinery exposed in action was disastrously illustrated when the Sassacus was exploded in Albemarle sound, and the Hatteras disabled by the Alabama in the Gulf of Mexico, by a single shot passing through a portion of their steam machinery.

And then we have another significant fact on this point in the remark they make, that the engines differ from those of the best practical engineers. They were mere innovations. However they may be justified hereafter, they were against the opinion of the profession when adopted, and against the experience of the best vessels in the United States service as the commission of engineers report, and they are different from those vessels which now make the best time at sea under the ordinary conditions of the application of machinery to the propulsion of vessels. They were mere innovations; ideas that came across the head of the chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering; and they, engines and boilers, stand condemned by this commission, which was summoned by the Department to pass its judgment upon them.

On one innovation, made without experiment or any proposed advantage, the board speak, as follows:

"Both in the naval and merchant marine large sums of money have been expended in constructing elaborate machinery, especially required to accomplish long ranges of expansion. On the other hand, during the past two years, some twenty-five or thirty vessels (mostly in the Navy) have been provided with machinery constructed on a different theory, namely, that it was more economical to make the steam cylinders of such dimensions that a small range of expansion could be used.

"We respectfully submit that a knowledge of the fact of which of these systems is the most economical, would be productive of so great a moneyed economy to the Government that we cannot but earnestly recommend that you will authorize the necessary experiments to determine this question, particularly as an expenditure not to exceed from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars only would be required, which, in comparison to the importance of the subject, is insignificant.

"The members of this board, in their individual capacity, will cheerfully devote their services in devising the mode in which these experiments should be made, and also devote the necessary time to conduct them."

Then the board advised experiments to test the relative values of the horizontal and vertical tubular boilers, chiefly out of deference to the Department's partiality for the latter, which they had condemned in the form used by the Bureau of Engineering. This report was made in February or March, 1863, and it condemned everything that had been done at that time, every engine that had then been placed by the Department in a naval vessel. We are told that these investigations are now going on, in the report of the Secretary to this session. The Bureau of Steam Engineering informs us that now, that is to say in December, 1864, when the report came in, commissioners were sitting to determine those two problems proposed for solution in February, 1863, and were carrying on their investigations in November and December, 1864, to advise the Department what course it should pursue in creating new engines.

Now, what has been the course of the Department while that investigation was going on? Why, sir, I hold here a report of the chief of the Engineer Bureau, of the 28th November, 1864, which, after eulogizing the form of boiler which that board of engineers condemned, and giving us his assurance that his subsequent experiments quite justify his opinion, condemned by the board of engineers, informs us that, on the 28th of November, 1864,

"A board, consisting of the principal steam-engine builders of the country and the chief of this bureau, is now experimenting with critical accuracy on two boilers of the respective types, for the purpose of definitely determining their relative merits for the naval service under every variety of circumstance and of proportion. It is believed the results will be of the utmost importance to all engaged in the manufacture and use of steam machinery.

"Another board, consisting of three members of the Franklin Institute, three of the Academy of Sciences, and three on the part of the Department, are now experimenting with the utmost precision on machinery devised by Mr. Horatio Allen, of the Novelty Iron Works, New York city, one of the board, to determine by practical results the economy of using steam with different measures of expansion, under different conditions of mechanism, pressure, and back pressure. It is believed these experiments will give a correct practical solution to a very vexed problem, and be of incalculable benefit."

That is to say, experiments of vital moment proposed in February, 1863, to guide the Department in the expenditure of millions, and to determine the value of the whole machinery of the Navy, have been cleverly protracted from February, 1863, till November, 1864, that is, during twenty-one months, nearly two years; and while this was going on, we are informed that the Department has solved those problems in its own sense; and in the face of this report of the board of engineers and its judgment upon the machinery of the bureau, it has ordered machinery of its own condemned types, to the amount of millions of money, for I cannot tell how many vessels. The statement of contracts for steam machinery, made by the Bureau of Steam Engineering since the 1st of August, 1863, that is, six months after the report of the board of engineers, shows contracts for twenty-one engines at $400,000 each, four at $580,000 each, two at $600,000, and two at $700,000 each, amounting to about twelve million dollars; all after August, 1863; all after the condemnation of the board of engineers; all pending the experiments which were to determine their structure! In what year the last were ordered is perhaps not quite certain, for the dates are not very distinctly set forth; but all seem to be in 1863.

What I ask the attention of the committee to is the fact that a board of engineers, summoned by the Department, condemned all the machinery the Department had placed in any wooden vessel up to the date of its sessions, and that the Department, instead of changing its course, goes on and constructs machinery upon identically the same principle, as the Bureau of Engineers informs us. I speak now upon the report.

And then, as if to add mockery to this abuse of the public confidence, they tell us that now, after the time which has elapsed between February and March, 1863, and November, 1864, they are diligently pursuing investigations to settle questions which they have practically solved by the expenditure of millions of dollars upon work which has been condemned by a board authorized by the Department itself more than a year ago, and pending experiments intended to determine some of the most vital points of the machinery! If that is wise action, then let others explain it. If there are differences of opinion so grave as that, then it is time to stop until the problem is solved, and not say that, after having built a whole navy at such stupendous sacrifice of money, they are now diligently pursuing investigations for the purpose of solving a problem which they have practically solved by this great expenditure. That is a trifling with the country which should bring down upon them the indignation of this House. And if no other fact existed, that should be a sufficient reason to surround the head of the Navy Department with responsible advisers, whose opinions he cannot disregard, whose opinions he cannot push away in the pigeon-holes of the Department, where they may lie until they are brought out after weeks of investigation by our committees, but who would command respect from the head of the Department, or bring down condign punishment upon his head if neglected. It is to prevent such an abuse of the public confidence as is shown by the report of the board of engineers on the one side and the report of the Engineer Bureau on the other that I have drawn the proposition I have offered; and in drawing it I have embodied in it as nearly as I could, and as the system of our Government would allow, the provisions which have by the experience of other countries and our own from time to time been found useful to guide and aid the discretion of the Secretary when novel ships or great expenditures on new forms of naval defense were about to be hazarded, and to prevent this great squandering of the public money. In my judgment it will be a guarantee of an efficiency of service hereafter such as we have never had heretofore.

I have already detained the House longer than

I intended. I merely wish to say now that so far as I can get information from any source whatever, the speed of the engines placed in the naval vessels constructed by the Department up to this time falls two or three miles short of what they ought to have attained according to the board of engineers. When the question was raised upon that subject in the newspapers some time ago, the statement that the screw sloops of the Department could not exceed between nine and ten knots, it drew out a reply from a distinguished officer in the Navy, who said that it was very far from being true that none of the vessels of the Navy could go more than nine or ten miles an hour under steam continuously, under the conditions of the naval service—not running down the Potomac without armament, or coal, or ammunition, or water, or provisions, and in smooth water, but as sea. It is the only direct, authentic published statement that I have ever seen from any naval officer respecting the speed of any of the vessels of the United States built by the present Department which carried their speed above ten miles an hour. But the contradiction is solved by noting the names of the vessels forming the exceptions. Captain Craven, the heroic officer who went down with the monitor Tecumseh in Mobile bay, is the officer referred to, and his card, in answer to the suggestion that none of the Department vessels would go more than ten knots an hour under naval conditions, stated that he had commanded both the Kearsarge and the Tuscarora, and that they could go thirteen knots an hour.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Kearsarge and the Tuscarora are not provided with machinery built by the Department or the Bureau of Engineering, but they are two vessels-of-war which were duplicates in structure and machinery of the Ironclad, the Mohican, and the Seminole, vessels constructed by the last Administration, whose engines are constructed on the principles that the new Bureau of Engineering has condemned—principles which it has discarded in the construction of the new engines, but which prevailed in the structure of the old vessels of the United States Navy, and of the vessels constructed in navies abroad. And I say that this is evidence in corroboration of the fact that none of the vessels whose machinery is devised by the bureau can approach the speed which it is said by the board of engineers ought to be attained, and can be attained, with proper machinery, under naval conditions for naval vessels. The number of revolutions of the screw, not exceeding sixty or sixty-two a minute, and the pitch of the screw, limit the speed of the screw sloops to less than ten knots an hour, unless a vessel can go faster than her propeller; and that such is the limit appears officially by the report that the Monongahela, in sailing full speed against the Tennessee, made sixty-two revolutions, manifestly the utmost limit of her power; and that they are under twelve knots an hour is implied by the board of engineers assigning that as the desirable limit, while they condemn the machinery and say it might, by change in type and detail, have in the screw steamers been increased in power to the extent of one third. It is plain they thought the speed of the sloop not over nine knots. The impunity of the Alabama and her consorts for three years is the practical result.

Now, sir, without going further into details upon this subject, for I desire to stop where official data stop, I submit that the course of the Department with reference to the iron-clads and its course with reference to the construction of machinery, all other matters being laid aside, show the necessity of some supervising board, some advisory power beyond the authority which is at the head of the Navy Department, to secure us against disaster in some great day of battle, and to secure to the nation the benefit of the money that it is now expending in the structure of vessels. We have spent already, sir, over $280,000,000 on our Navy, and yet at this day there has been accomplished scarcely anything which ought to be satisfactory to the nation or which materially adds to its security. I trust, sir, that by the adoption of this amendment a security will be provided for the future, for nothing can remedy the squandering of the past.

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Rice.

HO. OF REPS.

BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. RICE, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3, 1865.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866, the pending question being the amendment submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That no money appropriated for the naval service shall be expended otherwise than in accordance with the following provision, so far as it is applicable; that is to say, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral and one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer highest in rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the consideration of the subject.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on any matters submitted by him relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war. All such opinions shall be recorded.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel of war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel of war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments decided to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board from time to time other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am at the present time very ill prepared to reply to the remarks which have been made by the honorable gentleman from Maryland; but I am not willing that this speech shall have been made in this House and pass out to the country without my saying a single word upon the subject, although I am obliged to speak without special preparation and in the absence of certain statistics which would be most valuable to me if I had them here at hand.

It is but natural, too, that I should rise under some embarrassment, with some feelings of diffidence, to reply upon the spur of the moment to the elaborate speech which has been delivered by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, a speech for which, it is quite manifest, he had made a careful collection of such statistics as might serve his purpose, and in which he has discussed the subject in hand with that degree of warmth and enthusiasm which is apt to arise from the fervor of some measure of personal hostility.

I think the gentleman has been unfortunate in the selection of the proposition which he has submitted to the House. It is, sir, nothing more nor less than that this Congress and the Navy Department of the United States shall throw away all the teachings of experience, both at home and abroad, and shall take a retrograde step, placing the administration of our naval affairs where it was nearly a century ago.

The honorable gentleman has taken occasion, in the opening portion of his remarks, to refer to the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs upon the bill which he has discussed, and which he has brought in here and submitted, I think, contrary to all rule and to all precedent, as an amendment to an appropriation bill, and before there was opportunity for the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom that subject had been referred, to present the report upon which they had concluded long before his amendment was offered.

Now, sir, I desire to say for the members of that committee, that if any gentleman in this House chooses to call in question their diligence, their industry, and their patience, let him resort to the room, and to the records of the committee, and find how far their patience has been tried and their time absorbed by useless investigations thrown upon their hands in a resolution submitted by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, during the last session of Congress.

Sir, the resolution to which I allude was a sweeping one, aimed at no particular point, looking to the correction of no particular evil; but one starting out this Committee on Naval Affairs upon an exploring expedition to ransack the whole transactions of the Naval Department; the mysteries of the construction of steam machinery, and the investigation of professional and scientific, as well as of practical questions. The subjects for investigation ran also into matters of personal quarrels; into the connection of alleged and fictitious abuses on the part of persons connected with the Navy Department, and into other acts through the agency of other persons which I will not consume the time of the House, or tire its patience even by relating. The character of this labor and its results are to be found in the report of the Naval Committee recently submitted to the House.

Now, sir, in prosecuting the labor imposed by that resolution alone, the Committee on Naval Affairs consumed more than seventy sittings during the last session of Congress, an average of three days every week of the session from the time the resolution was offered; and the investigation, with all the diligence, all the labor, and all the care which could be bestowed, was not concluded until the very last days of June. And since the present session of Congress convened it has devolved upon the committee to prepare a report covering that vast mass of documentary evidence and testimony which the House, affrighted by its magnitude, refused on Monday last to allow to be printed. It has been necessary during this session to examine and analyze that whole testimony, to collect all the facts and statistics, to separate the wheat from the chaff, and to select that which was true out of that which was false, and to report the result to the House. And, sir, without instituting any invidious comparison between the labors and diligence of that committee and those of any other committee of this House, I should do great injustice to my colleagues upon that committee if I did not bear testimony to the fact that neither their personal convenience nor comfort has been allowed to interfere with the diligent discharge of their duties. So much, sir, in regard to the amount of labor and attention which have been bestowed by the Committee on Naval Affairs upon the subject referred to them by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question of the expediency of putting the Navy Department under the surveillance of a board of examiners, or a board of administration, the committee proceeded to consider as soon as they could gain time from the pressure of other and more important matters; and, as I said before, weeks ago they were ready to submit their action and conclusions to this House as soon as its rules would permit, and, if necessary to do so, to submit the reasons for the decision to which they arrived.

Now, I desire to say here, that the report which the committee are ready to make whenever they have an opportunity, is adverse to the proposition submitted by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] and if the House will indulge me I will proceed to state, with as much brevity as the circumstances permit, some of the reasons which have led us to that conclusion. The proposition of the honorable gentleman is substantially that the Navy Department of the United States shall be put under a similar kind of administration to that by which the British navy is at present controlled; and I need not say to any gentleman who has examined that subject, that the British Board of Admiralty is to-day, of all administrative things in England, the most unpopular among the people and Government of that nation.

The administration of the navy of Great Britain was vested originally in an officer called the "Lord High Admiral of the British Navy," an office which has not been filled, except for a very short period, for nearly one hundred and eighty years, the exception being its occupation by the Duke of Clarence in 1827; at all other times it has been placed in commission, as the phrase is, a commission consisting of two lords, four commissioners, and two secretaries, the incumbents being so appointed and retired as to be in harmony and sympathy with the dominant party in the Government for the time being. And what has been the result? Just precisely what one would expect would be the result of the action of an organization having no individual responsibility, and feeling the stimulus of no executive power.

We all know that after the accession of Louis Napoleon to the throne of France, and when that wonderful man commenced, as he did almost immediately, to bestow his attention upon the condition of the navy of that empire, and its comparative magnitude and prowess with that of Great Britain, Parliament and the British people were both intensely excited at the rapid strides France was making in the construction of a great navy, and the periodicals and the leading men of Great Britain in Parliament summoned to the bar of public opinion this irresponsible and inactive Board of Admiralty, that they might, if possible, give an account of how it happened that the British navy had gone into disrepute, and was so far behind everything which it should have been when compared with the wants of the nation, or the vast sums of money expended upon it; and four years ago, when the war broke out in this country, and the stupendous achievements that were made by the Navy Department of the United States, in constructing our naval force, became known across the water, they also attracted the attention of the Government and the people of Great Britain, and now, more than ever before, public opinion condemned the inefficiency of this Board of Admiralty, and interrogated them to show why it was that when France was making these rapid strides, and the Government of the United States was outstripping France even, the British Board of Admiralty sat supinely in their seats and were doing absolutely nothing to preserve the relative naval force of Great Britain.

The United Service Magazine, published in London, a high British authority, said in 1862, while discussing the British admiralty system, that—

"There is something so clumsy in the machinery of a board, that the leading statesmen of all parties who have of late years devoted their attention to the reconstruction of the large Government departments, have given their opinion against this mode of conducting public business."

The select committee on military organization which sat in 1860, and which was composed chiefly of Prime Ministers and ex-Prime Ministers, of Secretaries and ex-Secretaries of State, of First Lords and ex-First Lords of the Admiralty, also reported as follows, upon Lord Grey's proposal that the army should be governed by a board:

"This board would be a new experiment; it undoes all that has been done." * * * "Instead of concentrating responsibility it redistributes it. The machinery of boards is known to be cumbersome and uncertain in its operation; it only works well when the head of it acts as if he alone were responsible. A board, therefore, would be a retrograde measure, which we cannot recommend."

According to the same authority—

"Even Sir James Graham, who favors the continuance of the present system of naval administration, states that if the command of the navy were a new machinery to be constructed he should not wish to have a board such as the Board of Admiralty."

Other leading men and authorities have spoken of this board in even stronger terms of disfavor, as a feeble and unsatisfactory mode of administering the Navy, and this in such numbers as to lead one to suppose that nothing but the proverbial unwillingness to make a radical change in any part of their governmental organization would tolerate its continuance. And let me call attention to the fact that it is not against the personnel of this Board of Admiralty that the objection lies, but against the system itself; for the Board of

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Rice.

HO. OF REPS.

Admiralty of Great Britain has from time to time embraced some of the wisest, some of the most experienced, and some of the most judicious naval authorities in Great Britain. But during all the time of its existence down to the present it has hardly been able promptly and efficiently to put forth the efforts which were necessary to provide against the exigencies of war which at all times are liable to occur. As I have already shown, British authorities who have investigated for themselves the subject, declare in their periodicals, reports, and speeches, that this Board of Admiralty is an organization which is defective in its very nature, and therefore it cannot be made of paramount value by the administration of any men, however efficient, excellent, and experienced they may be. Yet this, let me say, is substantially the system which the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis,] if I understand him, desires we shall establish here; a system which after a test of more than two hundred years in Great Britain is more than almost anything else connected with their Government in disrepute, both with the Government and with the people, and has singularly failed in presenting any positive advantage, as the present condition of the British navy shows. This is the system which the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] desires us to institute here. This is the kind of trammel that he desires to put over the chief officer of our Navy Department.

I have alluded to the accession of Louis Napoleon to the throne of France, and to the immediate attention which he bestowed upon the construction of the navy of that empire, and to the effect which the naval movements of France have had upon Great Britain. I need not inform this committee that the navies of France and Great Britain are constructed almost wholly with reference to a single point, and that is, the relative power of the two nations. They are rivals in everything, and jealous of each other. They are hostile to each other, and their hostility and their jealousy extends to everything connected with the interests or with the power of either of those nations.

Now, sir, as soon as the emperor of France looked out upon what was supposed to be the formidable navy of Great Britain, and which indeed was formidable among the navies of the world at that period, he found that if he were to secure his throne, if he were to maintain the dignity of France, if he were to retain the fealty and the confidence of his subjects, he must provide a power that should be able to meet the navy of Great Britain on any sea, and that should be able to protect the coast of France against any assaults that might be made by Great Britain. Therefore, sir, the construction of the English navy and of the French navy has, as I have said, in a great degree become a reciprocal operation. When Great Britain builds a ship, then France builds a ship; and when France builds an iron-clad, Great Britain must build an iron-clad; and so they go on multiplying day after day, and year after year—not because of any particular exigency that is pressing upon those nations at the moment, but because neither can afford to be behind the other in the number and the armament of its ships.

Well, sir, Louis Napoleon is known to the world. When he ascended the throne of France he became France. He is that voltaic battery placed on the seat of power in the nation, whose touch sends the vital impulses throughout his whole empire. He is the head of the navy of France, as he is the head of everything else that is great connected with that nation. He wants no boards of admiralty to sit down and dream over what in some possible exigency it may be expedient to do. He wants no board of admiralty that shall hamper the progress of the French armies or navies when the exigency arrives. But he, sir, is the living and the vitalizing power, and when he speaks the word it is done; when he commands, every man and everything under the power and control of the French nation stands fast to service and duty.

The administration of the French navy, therefore, is a totally different organization from that of the British Admiralty. The British Admiralty is responsible to nobody. Each board is moreover involved with its successor and with its predecessor, as a serpent involves its coils; and if there be faults or omissions arising in the administration of the navy, it is almost as impossible to fix the precise point of responsibility among these successive boards of admiralty as it is to fix the precise point of motive power in a serpent's body. The board of administration of France is, on the contrary, an organization having, through all its departments, the element of individual responsibility and of special attention. Every man who has a duty to perform in connection with the administration of the French navy is responsible; he can be ferreted out; the exact measure of his responsibility can be fastened upon him; and everybody knows what is the fate of an irresponsible or unfaithful officer before the man who sits upon the French throne.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Maryland in proposing this measure has not only run contrary to the experience of France and of England upon this subject, but he proposes to leap over the whole period of time during which this Government has had an existence. Why, sir, when the Navy of the United States first came into being, in 1775, we then had a Marine Committee. In 1776 we had what was called a Continental Navy Board. In 1779 we had a BOARD OF ADMIRALTY. In 1798 a Navy Department was established, with a Secretary of the Navy. In 1815 we had a Board of Navy Commissioners appointed. In 1842 all these irresponsible boards, these debating societies organized to discuss and to settle the principles upon which our Navy should be constructed and administered, were wiped out of the way, under the experience which the Government had had through this long period, and a Navy Department, substantially like that which we now have, was established. We got along very well from 1842 up to 1862, the second year of this war, under the Navy Department as it was organized in 1842. And, sir, what did the wisdom of Congress determine after two years of experience amid the trials of this war, added to the long experience in a peace establishment? What did the wisdom of Congress decide was expedient to be done in 1862, when the height of the pressure of this war was upon us, when new exigencies were arising every day, when there was a demand for the loftiest and broadest wisdom and experience that the country could furnish in respect to the best method of administering the Navy? Why, sir, it did not establish a board of admiralty; it did not establish a board of commissioners; it did not run across the water and adopt the system of admiralty which the Government of Great Britain was just then trying earnestly and laboriously to dispense with. But Congress did amplify the existing Navy Department, changing none of its material features, but enlarging it to meet the added necessities which were brought upon it and upon the country by this gigantic war.

So, sir, it is only two years since the Navy Department was reorganized and indorsed in its present form; and I hazard nothing in saying that, as a Department, I think it is the most complete and among the most efficient and responsible of all the Departments of the Government. It approximates nearer to the idea of a Department than does any other branch of the executive power of this land that I know of. We have at its head a Secretary of the Navy; and under him are subdivisions of the Department, eight in number, styled bureaus, each of which bureaus has its own specialty, with its own officer placed at its head, men of broad experience and versed in the particular subjects and duties they are called upon to consider and discharge; men who are responsible both to the country and to Congress, and to the head of the Navy Department, inasmuch as they stand in conspicuous positions and cannot screen from observation the nature and character of their duties or the manner in which they perform them. Each head of a bureau is supposed to know everything in detail belonging to the particular branch of naval duty which belongs to that bureau, and to have the executive ability to bring his work to completion. He makes up the annual estimate of the amount which will be required to be expended upon the particular objects of that bureau; but he cannot expend a single dollar of the money which Congress appropriates for the Navy, nor enter into any engagement, except by the permission of the Secretary of the Navy himself; so that under this system we have combined the advantages of individual skill and responsibility supervised and ultimately controlled by a general head.

The head of each one of these bureaus is therefore directly responsible to the chief of the Navy, and yet the chief of the Navy is not hampered by the divided counsel of those bureau chiefs. He is the man who, after all, is called upon to stand up before Government and people and assume the responsibility of whatever appertains to the administration of that department of the public service.

So, sir, we have in the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland no new proposition whatever, but one which we have already tried, improved upon, and discarded.

But the honorable gentleman says no other country has such a system as our own.

Well, sir, if I mistake not, it is no novel or strange thing for the United States to be found differing from the rest of the world either in the nature of its Government or in its administration. If I remember rightly, there are many particulars in which the progress of this nation, and in which the means and facilities and power of this nation, differ and have always differed from any other nation on the face of the earth.

And I will say just here that I have no prepossession for or any prejudice against anything, whether it appertains to the Navy or to any other Department of the Government, because it is or is not foreign in its origin and use. I recognize the fact that there are many things appertaining to the Governments and the people of nations of the earth which are specialties of their own, which are national peculiarities, immediately recognized and known of all men, but they do not necessarily constitute in themselves standards of merit; and simply because a thing is or is not found elsewhere, does not bring to my mind any argument for either adopting it or dismissing it here, except so far as it may have been proved to be valuable or useless by the experience of other nations or our own. I hold that the experience of mankind is the property of mankind; and if it be true that whoever, acting as an individual or as a member of a Government, disregards the experience of the world, may travel possibly into a slough of trouble and difficulty from which that experience might have saved him, it is also true that if a man plant himself entirely upon that which some other man has experienced under the same or different conditions and circumstances, his fate will be hardly happier than that of him whom I have described in antithesis.

Now, it will be seen that the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maryland is not in favor anywhere in the world where it has been submitted to the test of experience. It will be found that it has been tried already, over and over again, in a great variety of forms, and that it has been cast aside because it has been proved here to be, as it will prove, to be wherever it is tried, irresponsible, inefficient, and uncertain in its operation.

But, Mr. Chairman, I think no man who has listened to the speech delivered by the honorable gentleman from Maryland can have failed to see that he had a double purpose in making it, and that his amendment was only a precursor, and a small one at that, to the real object which he had in view. In the hour and a half or three quarters during which he discussed this subject, he spent but a very small portion of it in elaborating or elucidating facts or arguments in support of the establishment of a board of naval administration, while he did occupy the larger portion of his time in discussing what he is pleased to indicate as the faults and failures of the Navy of the United States.

I remember, sir, because I am reminded of it by the speech of the gentleman from Maryland, that this proposition which he has introduced here was made as long ago as last April. It seems to me that if the question of the efficiency or of the failure of the Navy of the United States is to be discussed in the interest of those who complain, it would have been much better, in the light of history and of events, for the gentleman to have discussed it at the time when it was originally submitted.

Let us see, sir, what are some of the facts in regard to this Navy which the gentleman would have us bring into disrepute, which he would have us put under surveillance, which he would have us hamper with a Board of Admiralty, to discuss every topic, great or small, that should arise in the service. All the resources of the country, vast as they are, whether public or private, have been brought into requisition, in one form or another, to deliver the country from the perils in which it was involved by this gigantic civil war. I need not remind members of this committee that in December, 1860, the State of South Carolina passed an ordinance of secession, to take that State out of the Union, and that early in the following year several of the Gulf States followed the example of South Carolina, so that before the President was inaugurated in March, 1861, and before any of the Departments were organized in harmony with the head of the Government, and in accordance with the legally expressed will of the people of the country, some seven or eight States had already left the Union, as far as it was possible for them to do so, by passing ordinances of secession. Gentlemen need not be reminded that before the Navy Department was organized there was not a single place between Chesapeake bay and the Rio Grande, on the Atlantic coast or on the Gulf coast, that was not in possession of the rebels. They need not be reminded that, in taking possession of this vast extent of territory, the rebels also took possession of two of the five navy-yards belonging to the United States, one of them the most important of all the navy-yards of the country, that of Norfolk. Not only did the rebels capture these navy-yards, but they captured some of our ships in them, and a vast amount of ordnance and naval supplies. They captured at the Norfolk navy-yard more than two thousand pieces of heavy ordnance three hundred of which were Dahlgren guns, more also at Pensacola, and a vast amount of small-arms and naval stores.

In what condition was the country then left—with more than thirty-five hundred miles of sea-coast and with more than thirty-five hundred miles of navigable inland waters to take care of? What means did the Government then possess for the performance of that mighty and stupendous work? Our whole Navy consisted at that time of but forty-six vessels, and of these nearly one half were out of commission. A part of those that were in commission were on foreign stations, and at the time of the secession of the rebel States there were but four naval vessels left available to the Government of the United States with which to proceed to reclaim the navy-yards, forts, and territory that had been seized by the rebels, in accordance with the avowed purpose of the President of the United States, to which both Houses of Congress and a vast majority of the people heartily responded.

Here was the work; to recover and to guard this vast extent of sea-coast and inland waters, to be done with old ships, if at all, or to be done by new means and instrumentalities devised by that man who holds the responsible position of Secretary of the Navy. Does any one suppose, sir, that it would have been possible for the Secretary of the Navy to have built ships enough to have guarded the whole coast of the Atlantic, from the capes of the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande, and to navigate the inland waters of the country, wresting them, place by place, one after another, from the hands of the rebels, if he had had to wait until he could build the ships, and cast and finish the ordnance necessary to perform this gigantic undertaking? It is an absurdity to make such a suggestion. Then I want to know what was left open for the Secretary of the Navy to do but just precisely that which he did do, and which is here at this time made the subject of hostile criticism and animadversion by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis.] He went out to his countrymen, and said to them: "Give me your ships; give me your yards; give me your foundries; give me your machine-shops; give me your rope-walks; give me everything that you have suited to the purpose, in order that I may, according to the best of my ability use them for my country, and while you and I stand alike in the face of mankind to be tried by its judgment, as to whether we can or cannot accomplish this gigantic undertaking, while the friends of despotism, and the enemies of republics are looking on and hoping that we shall fail, I ask you to come forward and give me your ships, and your facilities, be they what they may, in order that we may vindicate the patriotism, skill, and capacity of American workmen and people, in quenching this fire of rebellion; that we may have the pleasure, the inexpressible and unbounded pleasure, of showing to mankind that however great your disadvantages; that however small the resources at the command of the Government, yet, when the national life is assailed, there is no limit to the power which the American people will bring out for the use of their Government to enable them to save the national life from any hand by which it may be assailed, whether it be foreign or domestic."

The appeal of the Secretary of the Navy did not go out to his countrymen unregarded and unheeded. They responded to it. They brought out every ship that was available for naval service, and put them at the disposal of the Navy Department; and the Navy Department availed itself to the utmost of the ability of our citizens, limited only by the resources of the country, in procuring ships and ordnance and men and material of every kind, to enable it to carry out the gigantic undertaking that rebels and traitors had forced upon its hands. Nor did it act unwisely in this particular. If gentlemen can translate themselves from this present hour, in February, 1865, back to 1861, and contemplate the necessity that then existed of contributing in any manner and in every manner of the resources of the country; if they can recall the anxiety they then felt that the Navy should do all that it could, and vastly more than it was doing, I think that in that state of mind they will not be prepared to condemn the Navy Department because it availed itself of the ships of the merchant service when there were none belonging to the Navy, and when all the yards of the Government, and all the shops of the country were working night and day, and were all totally inadequate to supply the immediate and pressing exigencies under which the Government was then laboring.

The honorable gentleman comments upon the character of these merchant vessels, and dwells upon the absurdity of counting them in among the naval resources of the country. But I think that, if he had dwelt upon the topic in all its lights and in all its bearings, he could not have failed to discover that, under that generic term "the Navy," there is a great variety of duty to be performed, and that there is duty that can be performed as well, or nearly as well, by vessels that were built for the merchant service as by those which were built especially for the naval service.

But passing from this point, for it is not worth while to discuss it in the light of the facts, the alternative then presented was, will you have these ships or will you have no ships? Will you do all you can to arrest the progress of this rebellion, or will you sit down supinely, as a board of admiralty might have done, sucking your thumbs and saying that the undertaking is totally beyond the capacity and genius of the American people to enter upon and to accomplish? Not only was the Government without vessels and without ordnance, but in the first year of the war, out of the small number of officers that composed the Navy two hundred and fifty-nine resigned or went over to the enemy in order that they might command the ships and make use of the ordnance which they had stolen from the Government of the United States at Norfolk and Pensacola and elsewhere. So that our losses were not only losses to ourselves in ships and material, but they were gains in the same kind and degree to the rebels; and they gained in addition a large number, if not all, of the one hundred and fifty-nine officers of the American Navy to make use of those ships and of those materials.

Well, sir, during this year 1861, starting in the spring with only four vessels available for the whole uses of this gigantic war, to blockade all the southern ports, to recover all the places that had been stolen from us, to open the great internal channels of commerce—starting, I say, with those four vessels, before the close of the year 1861, the first year of the war, during a period of only about nine months, the number increased from four vessels to two hundred and twenty-six. This is the work accomplished, so far as outfitting a navy is concerned, by this Department in the first nine or ten months of the war. During the second year that number was increased to between three and four hundred. During the next year, if I remember rightly, it rose up to more than five hundred and eighty. And now, sir, at the end of the fourth year, we have a Navy of six hundred and seventy-one vessels; not all built on one plan, not all built of one size, not all built of one fashion and for one use, as the honorable gentleman from Maryland would seem to imply by his argument would have been judicious, but various in their construction and appliances, adapted to the ever-changing, ever-new exigencies and necessities of this great war.

Now, sir, not to leave entirely out of sight the value of the advice that may be derived from a board of consultation, I desire to state here that, while all the responsibility settles down upon the head of the Navy, and upon the chiefs of the bureaus of the Navy Department, yet, sir, without a board of administration which it is obliged by the force of law to consult and to defer to, the Navy Department has hardly taken a single step of great importance without summoning, as the chief of that Department has the undoubted right to do, a board of consultation and advice from those who are experienced in the Navy in commanding our ships, experienced in all the details of war, as well as in all naval literature and practice, that he might have the benefit both of their experience and of their professional knowledge. Those boards have been constituted over and over again as specialties have demanded. They have not been exceptional cases; they have been the rule rather than the exception. And the Secretary of the Navy, feeling that it rested upon him to take the responsibility, to assume accountability for what shall be actually done, without regard to the character of the advice which he may receive, has, after hearing the opinions that have been expressed by those whom he has consulted, moved forward, in accordance with the dictates of his own judgment, to do those things which he believed to be best for the interest of the country and the accomplishment of the gigantic work which he had in hand.

Why, sir, almost immediately after the Administration was organized, it became indispensable that there should be certain points upon the Atlantic coast recovered and put in possession of the Government as depots for naval supplies, as places of resort for vessels that were doing duty on the Atlantic. And what did the Secretary of the Navy do? Why, sir, he did not send in here and ask you to give him a board of naval administration, but he sent out to some of the most experienced officers of the Navy, to those who were most familiar with the coast; and he sent to the Coast Survey office; he had all the geography of the country and all the knowledge and experience of the country bearing upon the topic laid before him; and the opinion of a commission was taken as to the particular points that could be most advantageously recovered and most advantageously used after they were so recovered. And when the naval expeditions started out under Stringham and Du Pont for the capture of these places on the Atlantic coast, they started, sir, with a definite object to be accomplished, and that object was determined upon by the Secretary of the Navy after he had made use of all the means and all the resources at his command, including a commission of men specially versed in this department of his duty.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I have spoken, Mr. Chairman, very much longer than I anticipated when I arose, and I appreciate the kindness and courtesy of the House in allowing me an opportunity further to proceed; and I will endeavor to show my appreciation by not trespassing upon the patience of members further than may be absolutely necessary to present the case which I have in hand.

Now, sir, I was about to say that I would not go over a long and tedious recital of the number of boards which the Secretary of the Navy has from time to time summoned, that he might acquaint himself with their opinions, and, so far as he should determine, act in accordance with their advice. So far as that is concerned; he and the Department have had all the practical benefits of a board of admiralty without the loss of executive ability. And upon that one point of executive ability let me say that you may look over the annals of mankind, from the dawn of civilization to the present time, and you will find nowhere in the records of any nation so gigantic a performance in the way of constructing a navy in the same length of time as has been performed by the Navy Department of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is well to say right here—because it is pertinent to the remarks made by the gentleman from Maryland—that not only has this Navy Department had its attention carefully fixed upon absorbing the resources of its navy-yards and the private establishments of the country in the building of ships and ordnance and machinery, but it has also had closely at heart the grand result to which all naval warfare tends, or should tend, and that is, a victory; and in carrying out that idea it has not groped only among naval administrative reports of foreign countries; it has not blindly followed the lead of any nation; not merely imitated what the brains of some other man or some other people had devised, but taking the issues of the living present before it, and studying them, has addressed itself, whether by old means or by new means, at all events by successful means, to the accomplishment of the result to which, as I said before, all naval warfare should tend, victory.

And let me say here what is the distinctive American idea upon the subject—an idea differing entirely from the theories of either England, France, or any other nation on the face of the earth—and that is, in the first place, in respect to vessels, and in the second place in reference to ordnance; for, as has been well and justly said, since this war commenced the United States have reformed the whole system of naval warfare twice: first, in respect to the construction of ships; and secondly, in respect to the construction of ordnance. And that idea, the main idea, is this, to take away as far as possible in the construction of your ships the target to the enemy's guns; and in the second place, in the construction of your ordnance to put the greatest weight of metal into the smallest possible compass; and, sir, whether for weal or for woe, whether in success or in defeat, that is the American idea which has been working out and which is now working out in the construction of the American Navy.

Why, everybody knows that the first change which took place in naval ships—I speak not now of the period since the war commenced—was to dispense with sails and to adopt steam as the motive power. But since this war commenced the idea has been not only to construct steam vessels, but to construct iron vessels also; and in constructing iron vessels, not to construct broadside vessels only, carrying a large number of guns and standing many feet out of water, but to put the vessels as low in the water as practicable, and to compress, as I said before, the weight of your ordnance-metal into the smallest possible compass. And if anybody desires a practical illustration of the wisdom and efficiency of this theory when carried out to practical results, let me carry his mind back to that memorable Saturday morning in March, 1862, when your frigates with their immense broadsides lay in Hampton roads waiting and watching there for anything which might come to them from the harbor of Norfolk. And what did come? Why, sir, the Merrimac, a great and powerful iron-clad, came down on Saturday and sent to the bottom of the ocean your frigate Cumberland and your frigate Congress with as apparent ease as you would crush an egg-shell in your hand. And, sir, nothing under heaven saved the rest of that fleet except the fact that they were in very shoal water where the Merrimac was not able to follow them.

And how did it happen that the Merrimac, when she came down the next morning, did not make a similar disposition of the remainder of the fleet? How did it happen that she did not come along the coast, and up the Potomac, shell this seat of Government, and lay this capital in ruins? Why did she not go to Baltimore, why not to Philadelphia, why not to New York, Boston, and other important commercial places on the sea-coast, and lay them under contribution, and capture or destroy their shipping and defenses? Because on that Sunday morning the first practical development of this American idea of dispensing with a target for your enemy, and of concentrating the weight of your metal into the smallest possible compass, was made. The Merrimac came down just as confidently on Sunday morning as she had come down on Saturday; but, if I mistake not, and if history is not altogether at fault, she went back with an entirely different message to the southern confederacy on Sunday from that which she took back on Saturday. She met there, as the gentleman from Maryland has said, if not originally, yet felicitously, a raft with a cheese-box on it; and the result of that raft with a cheese-box on it, the result of that practical American idea, in which it differed from France and from England and from the world, was that when she discharged her immense guns into the sides of the Merrimac, that vessel, gigantic as she was, found that she was entirely unable to cope with this diminutive, untried Yankee notion. This experiment, for it was nothing more nor less than an experiment then, this first practical embodiment of the American idea, sent the gigantic rebel monster, constructed more after the plans of France and England, skulking back into the harbor of Norfolk, from which she never came out afterward.

And so, also, wherever this American idea has been subsequently tested the same result has followed. How was it in the case of the Fingal, constructed on the Clyde, and sent over here as a blockade runner, one specimen of those vast contributions which our former friend and—if I speak not unadvisedly—our recent enemy, has made to the southern confederacy in the building and supply of ships and ordnance to enable the rebels to tear down the pillars of this Government and to destroy our national life? How was it in the case of the Fingal, which came over here under the guise of a merchant vessel, which was taken up to Savannah and there altered, at an expense of millions of dollars, into a rebel iron-clad? After she was completed she came out at the appointed time, commanded by one who had served under the old flag, and filled with officers who were ingloriously transferring not only their allegiance but their experience to the flag of our enemy, and accompanied by transports filled with gay people, who were coming out as on a festive occasion, to witness the conflict between the Atlanta—which the Fingal had now become—and the Weehawken, commanded by that noble sailor and just and honest man, John Rodgers.

And what was the result of that trial between the combination of British and confederate skill and this American idea? Hardly had the Atlanta got into position, before a fifteen-inch shot from the Weehawken struck against her side, prostrated forty men upon her decks, and scattered barrels of splinters, of wood and iron, as the first announcement to the officers of the Atlanta of how great an advance had been made by this theory of compressing the weight of your metal into the smallest possible compass. After that one shot was fired it was utterly impossible for the commander of the Atlanta to bring his men back again to their guns; and before the Nahant, the cooperating vessel of the Weehawken, was able to get into position and fire a single shot, the white flag appeared on the Atlanta and she became a prize—a prize to this American idea. And she now floats under the stars and stripes, and is doing good and efficient service, as I understand, in the American Navy. Almost every successful naval battle that has been fought has been fought partly with the use of those monitors. The honorable gentleman from Maryland has stated what he would have us believe to be the testimony of high officials in the naval service in condemnation of these monitors, and yet if he will read the testimony of these men candidly and impartially he will find that they not only declare in their favor, but that they are unwilling to go into any great and important action without their assistance.

The gentleman from Maryland has referred to the magnificent and glorious achievements of Farragut in Mobile bay. But does the honorable gentleman desire me to tell him that before Admiral Farragut made his movement in Mobile bay he waited for iron-clads, and four of them did join his fleet before the action commenced, and I have here the testimony of Admiral Porter, if I could consume the time of the committee in reading from testimony, as the gentleman has done, but it is not worth while; whether it be on the Atlantic, or in the Gulf, or upon the Mississippi, the result is the same. For they have built iron-clads and iron vessels on the Mississippi and its tributaries as well as upon the Atlantic and in the Gulf, and every where they have turned out to be the most efficient and most powerful and the most formidable vessels ever constructed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall be obliged, in the fulfillment of my promise not to weary the House more than is necessary, to pass over many important features of this discussion. I want to say next, that when the fight took place between the Merrimac and the Monitor at Hampton Roads, a high British authority declared that the naval force of England amounted to but three or four vessels. I cannot quote his language precisely; but it was substantially that the naval force of Great Britain was wiped out; that they must begin de novo; that they must cast aside their Warriors, their Agincourts, and all the other like ships they had constructed, because the fight in Hampton Roads proved that the Monitor vessels, which presented no broadside to be perforated by the shot of the enemy, also carried a gun that would crush in the sides of the vessels built upon the English and the French plans. That demonstrated that the countless millions that they had expended under the wisdom and forecast of this Board of Admiralty was all for nothing.

We have to-day accomplished, in the construction of our naval vessels, the two things which the Government started out to accomplish when it entered upon this gigantic undertaking, so far as the theory of the construction of vessels is concerned. In the first place they desired to devise a vessel that would carry an armor which the ordnance of no foreign nation could shoot through, and then to place upon these ships guns throwing a weight of metal which, if it would not perforate, would crush in the side of any ship belonging to any other nation. And I say here, without the fear of contradiction, that that result has been accomplished, and that we to-day have vessels whose armor is a complete protection against the guns of any nation on the face of the earth, and that we also have on those vessels, on the Monitor vessels, guns that will drive from the ocean any vessel that may come in conflict with our ships.

Now, sir, I think that fact is not new on the other side of the water, if it is new here. That fact is not new in France and in England, if it be new in the United States. That fact is probably not new in the Parliament of Great Britain, or in the Chamber of Deputies of France, if it be new in the Congress of the United States. Let me say to you, that those Governments are to-day studying the monitor system of the United States with the most careful and anxious solicitude, to see by what means they may be able, if by any means whatever, to put themselves on an equality with the gigantic, and at present all but, if it be not altogether, irresistible naval power of the United States. Why, sir, is it a matter that need be told here, that the Governments of several foreign nations have sent special commissions here since the fight took place between the Monitor and the Merrimac, and the Weehawken and Atlanta, to study out if it may be this wonderful power that has been improvised amid the excitements and necessities of a gigantic and unexampled war? And besides that, every item of information which goes out from us in respect to this conflict to France and Great Britain, with whom we are in the closest communication, is sought for and maturely studied. Have gentlemen forgotten that Sweden has sent her officers here to specially study this system? And have you forgotten that the imperial Government of Russia sent a fleet over here, bringing some of her most accomplished officers, that they might acquaint themselves with the nature and character and probable results of these wonderful, improvised systems and implements of American naval warfare? Nor, sir, need I remind you or the honorable gentleman from Maryland that the imperial Government of Russia, sitting apart at the head of the eastern continent, overlooking it and ourselves, studying, watching, observing closely and anxiously the naval progress of all the naval Powers of the world—that the Russian Government, immediately after learning of the trial of one of these monitor vessels, ordered thirteen of them constructed to take their places as an efficient part of the Russian navy. And, sir, if need be, let me inform the gentleman from Maryland and everybody else, that for such results it was that the naval officers of that great Power came by the boards of admiralty of Great Britain and by the better naval organization of France, over here, across the Baltic and across the Atlantic ocean, to study here, upon American soil and in American waters, the nature and character of American ships and of American ordnance, and the ways and means by which such gigantic results have been produced in so short a period of time.

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Rice.

Sir, the honorable gentleman from Maryland directed his animadversions also against another class of vessels, the double-enders, or ferry-boats, as he was pleased to term them, but which everybody else recognizes as gunboats, constructed to meet the new exigencies which had arisen in the progress of this war. Everybody knows that this war has been mainly a defensive war—so far as foreign nations have been concerned, entirely so. It is known also that it has been necessary, in the prosecution of the war by the Navy, that there should be classes of vessels suited to a great variety of purposes and uses, and among others, that vessels especially were wanted that should be able to move into the rivers and into the shallow harbors of the southern coast. It is known also that when a vessel gets up into a river it takes a great deal of time to turn about, and that there are exigencies that would prevent its turning about, and all means of escape be consequently cut off. Hence it was that these vessels were constructed with double bows, in order that rather than wait perhaps under the fire of an enemy the time necessary to turn, or rather than be placed perhaps in a position where they could not turn, they might be able to retire without delay and without molestation. And those vessels have been among the most successful ships of the Navy.

Sir, it was told us some time ago, just as the gentleman has told us this morning, that the Dictator will not run over six knots an hour; it was told us that there was not a new vessel in the Navy that would make more than six or seven knots an hour. Well, sir, when the Committee on Naval Affairs undertook the investigation instituted by the resolution of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, there were two naval vessels frozen in by the ice at the Washington yard. By direction of the committee, I immediately notified the Secretary of the Navy that the Committee on Naval Affairs would require one or both of those vessels before they should leave the Potomac river, in order that a practical test of their speed might be made. I learned on inquiry that those vessels were the Sassacus and the Eutaw, two of this very lot of forty-seven double-enders to which the honorable gentleman from Maryland has alluded. Finding that they were duplicates of each other, and that it was useless to try the same thing over twice, I said to the Secretary that it would answer the purpose of the committee to try one of those vessels. Said he, "Which will you have?" Speaking entirely at random, for I knew nothing whatever of the vessels, I chanced to say, "We will take the Eutaw." And, sir, we took that vessel. I then said to the Navy Department that the committee would wish to have upon this vessel, during this trip, some practical engineer who is independent of the Navy Department and beyond the scope of its influence, and who would be competent to watch all the manipulations of the ship, the performance of her machinery in every particular, and able to report to the committee fairly and intelligibly concerning her performance. The services of an experienced practical engineer from the city of New York were secured, a gentleman who had constructed a vessel with which it was said no vessel of the Navy could successfully compete in speed. He accompanied the Committee on Naval Affairs and other gentlemen on that trial trip of the Eutaw down the Potomac river. Further than that, the committee were determined that the test should be made with such accuracy and such guarantees that the result should be beyond mistake; and we sent to the Coast Survey, asking the head of that department to detail officers with the proper charts and instruments to enable them to determine the distances run and the speed made from point to point. With that engineer to inspect the performance of the vessel, and with those officers of the Coast Survey to mark the distances and note the time, that experiment was made, and I have submitted to this House the official reports of those gentlemen upon that subject. They state that a vessel that could do nothing—that vessel that was a "failure," as forty-six others are, according to the honorable gentleman from Maryland—made a speed of 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour, equal to sixteen miles per hour. I have no reason to believe that her speed was greater than that of many others belonging to her class. There is the practical test made by a committee of this Congress, a committee of this House, appointed by its authority, and acting in obedience to its instructions. That is the result testified to by an accomplished engineer having no connection whatever with the Navy Department, and an officer who belongs to the Coast Survey office, and, so far as I know, having no partialities and no ends to subserve elsewhere.

Now, sir, I do not think it necessary for me to pursue and answer, in tedious detail, all the complaints made, whether in Congress or out of Congress, by men who, instead of elevating their minds to the consideration of the gigantic and successful achievements of the Navy and the best means of sustaining them, muse only in dissatisfaction, seeking for those things alone which they may visit with hostile criticism. Suffice it to say that during the progress of the investigation and in obedience to the instructions of this House in respect to these ships, and especially in respect to the machinery of those ships upon which the honorable gentleman has dilated, the committee spared neither time nor labor in examining every witness who was summoned before us. Some of them were before us two or three weeks, and the committee sat and heard their statements, and I hazard nothing in saying that a more triumphant vindication of any man or any Department was never made than is made by the testimony and the evidence gathered under that investigation. Such is the opinion of the committee.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland would have us believe that there have been great and important changes made in the construction of the vessels and the machinery of our Navy. I have already said something of the differences in the construction of the vessels. I have also intimated the difference which has taken place in the construction of ordnance, so that instead of scattering guns all around the side of a vessel, we compress the equivalent into ten, fifteen, and twenty-inch guns. And if the gentleman wants to know something else besides what he has mentioned which cannot be found anywhere else except in the United States, I can tell him two things which he cannot find elsewhere, and those are the fifteen and the twenty-inch guns. I can tell him that that fifteen-inch gun and that twenty-inch gun, which he cannot find anywhere else, is precisely the instrument and the only instrument on the face of this earth which will shoot through or crush in the sides of any naval vessel not sailing under the flag of the United States. And they can only be floated on the monitor, for the reason that in building a broadside vessel two or three hundred feet in length, and standing anywhere from twelve to fifteen feet out of water, in order to put upon her side a sufficient weight of metal to render her impervious to shot, you would get on so much weight as to send her to the bottom; whereas in the monitor vessel there is but little length compared with this broadside vessel, and instead of standing many feet out of water, she only stands a few inches out of water. Therefore, while the English cannot put upon their broadside vessels more than from four and a half to six inches of iron, through which we can shoot and crush their sides, we are able to support twelve and fourteen inches of iron upon so much of the sides of the monitor as are exposed to the shots of the enemy. And then our great guns are not distributed upon the broadside or deck of the vessel of the monitors, but are put into turrets twenty or more feet in diameter, the sides of which are protected by twelve or eighteen inches of iron, which cannot be shot through by any ordnance yet constructed.

And while upon this topic let me say a single word in regard to these monitors which the gentleman from Maryland has criticised so severely, saying that they would "dictate" to nothing except at the bottom of the ocean. Would it be very marvelous, if in the excitement and under the tremendous pressure of this war, the Navy Department, or the engineers of the country, should sometimes make a mistake?

Where is the man who has angelic wisdom, who goes to the fountain of all knowledge and dips out of its plenitude that measure which shall guaranty him against the common accidents and the common fallibilities of human nature? Tell me where the man is, what his name is, and then I shall perhaps be able to cite to you a man who can undertake a great and gigantic and untried experiment, prosecuted under unparalleled difficulties, and find no possibility for improvement on his first effort.

Now, sir, it is no extraordinary thing for a vessel to have a greater draught of water than she was designed to have. It is no extraordinary thing, as I am told, in vessels, whether they be built for the Navy or the commercial marine, that there should be some slight variation from the calculations in that respect. Is that such an unpardonable sin, then, as to call for the arraignment of a Department of this Government, as that it should be held up for censure here in the Congress of the United States before the people of the country and before the people of the world—some of them already sufficiently hostile to us and to our purposes? Is it so great a crime that the Navy Department, or those acting for it, should on one occasion or more, have made a small miscalculation of draught of water in the construction of a new and untried class of vessels?

But what does this error amount to? Why, it amounts to this, that these monitor vessels, which were designed to draw some six or seven feet of water, drew, if I recollect aright, some twelve or fifteen inches more than they were designed to draw? That fact was discovered when the first of these vessels was launched, and in season for the correction of the error in all but five; these five were taken for special use as torpedo boats. If they had not been applied to that use vessels would have had to be constructed for that purpose. What is the real importance of the mistake in constructing these vessels? It is not that they are ruined. It is that they must have on their sides one or two more courses of iron, just precisely as if a man were building a house one and a half story high, and should find when he got it along tolerably well toward completion that it would be more convenient and better suited and perhaps necessary to his purpose if he were to raise the roof a little higher and make it a complete two-story house. That is the sum of the matter. A few courses of iron have been added to the sides of these vessels, carrying their decks up higher, increasing their tonnage very materially, and involving an increased cost of about eighty-four thousand dollars apiece. That, sir, is what the mistake of these light-draught monitors amounts to.

And now, Mr. Chairman, to bring these remarks to a close, although I have by no means exhausted the subject, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that, in the long investigation which the Naval Committee had in reference to the construction of the engines and the boilers and the condensers and the valve gear in this naval machinery, they were found to be in accordance, for the most part, with the best authorities, with the best testimony; not only up to but surpassing the vessels which had been previously built in the Navy, so far as they were tested by their speed. And that is one way, I take it, in which we are to bring this question of ships and of machinery in ships to a practical test. I say here, as the result of investigation, that there is an increase of speed in the vessels built since over those built before the accession of the present Administration. Not only that, but I say that the vessels yet completed and put into service are not, according to this investigation, the vessels that have been built for the special accomplishment of speed; and I hazard nothing in saying that when those being built with that object are put into service, we will probably have the fastest as well as the most formidable defensive navy in the world.

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Pike.

H. OF REPS.

Now it seems to me to be a very strange time and a very singular selection of opportunity, after our experience in this war, to summon up here to the judgment of the country, for condemnation and censure by Congress and the country, the Navy Department of the United States. Why, sir, from the very dawn of this rebellion the Navy has been in efficient service. It has been created from four ships up to six hundred and seventy-one ships. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] has called the attention of the House to the vast expenditure of money, the wasteful squandering of large sums, upon what he characterizes as useless and unavailable ships of the Navy. Sir, let me tell you that according to British authority this American Navy has been created, has been put afloat and armed, and the Department carried on at an expense of less by $5,000,000 than it cost Great Britain to maintain her fleet during the same period of time, though she has been at peace.

These two examples illustrate the practical working of our system and theirs. The British navy is conducted by a Board of Admiralty whose defects are sufficiently described by their own people as attended by delays, divided councils, and the lack of economy and of executive power. It results from the fact that they are following old examples, and England regards what France does, and France regards what England does; whereas we have a navy organization that is vitalized, that is responsible, that acts upon the spur of the moment; and because it is able to seize the earliest opportunities and the best facilities for supplying its wants, may be always ready to meet exigencies and perils as they arise. And I think I hazard nothing in saying, in the presence of the facts, that there are claims now before the Naval Committee, from the manufacturers of the machinery of our Navy, asking for remuneration in the sum of millions of dollars which they have lost, because the bargains of the Navy Department were made so close, were so nicely scrutinized, that they have not been able under the exigencies of the war to do the work they contracted for at the estimated cost. Here we are to-day called upon virtually to pass a vote of censure upon the Navy Department, and to put it under the surveillance of an independent legalized board, in the presence of all that it has accomplished, whether it be in the construction of ships or in the achievement of victories.

Why, sir, as I have already said, from the dawn of the rebellion until now the Navy has been everywhere that it could be, and always has done glorious and efficient service. The Mississippi and its tributaries are open to commerce again; every port for blockade runners upon the Atlantic and the Gulf has been closed; all the strongholds seized by the enemy upon the coast have been recovered, and nearly every corsair driven from the ocean. The Navy was at Hatteras, at Port Royal, at Charleston, at Island No. 10, at Fort Donelson, at Fort Henry, at Shiloh, at Memphis, at Vicksburg, at Arkansas Post, at Port Hudson, at Mobile Bay, and at Fort Fisher. And in all those places it added radiance to the American name, and glory to the American naval history, which no lapse of time shall be enabled to obliterate. It has placed upon the imperishable record of fame, to be transmitted amid the plaudits of mankind to the latest generations, such names as Stringham, and Foote, and Du Pont, and Farragut, and Goldsborough, and Porter, and Dahlgren, and Rodgers, and Rowan, and Davis, and Winslow, and Cushing; and I should consume the day if I attempted to name them all. Their reputation is secure in history; it is secure in the hearts of their countrymen; and when the final history of this war shall be written out, and the comparison shall be made of the manner in which the different Departments of this Government have executed the high and laborious and responsible trusts committed to them, faithful and earnest as they have been, there will not be one of them that will stand brighter, or that will be more loudly or warmly commended by our successors, than will the Navy Department. And, sir, I cannot think that the well-earned fame of the naval service, this just meed of praise, will be diminished or obscured by any gentleman, however lofty his standing or however brilliant his abilities, who asks you, in the light of these facts, to put over your Navy Department a board of administration which shall be a change without improvement, or who cites to you the fact that, in the accomplishment of the gigantic labors that have fallen to the lot of that Department, it made a mistake in regard to the draught of a monitor, or an alleged but not admitted mistake in the construction of a double-ender.

BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.

SPEECH OF HON. F. A. PIKE, OF MAINE,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 4, 1865.

The House having resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and the amendments thereto—

Mr. PIKE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] asked yesterday why the Naval Committee had not at least reported the proposition which he had submitted to it. He said, and correctly, that he applied to members of that committee to have a report, whether it were in favor of or opposed to his proposition. If the gentleman means to treat the Naval Committee fairly, he should have stated further that that committee took up that measure at once. I was one of the persons to whom he applied, and the day after his application to me that measure was taken up in the Naval Committee. It was there discussed and put in train for report; but from that day to this there has been no opportunity when, under the rules of the House, that committee could make a report. And that was the reason, and the sole reason, why the report has not been made. The gentleman from Maryland had not the slightest reason to accuse the Naval Committee of an intention to smother his bill.

The gentleman further said that the Naval Committee, in their action on his bill, reflected the views of the Navy Department, as if the only desire of that committee was to register the decrees of that Department. I suppose the gentleman would not make that statement unless he had some evidence to sustain it; but for myself, as a member of that committee, while I am far from considering it a crime to act in conjunction with that Department on this or any other measure, I have never had any conversation with the Secretary or the Assistant Secretary of the Navy upon the subject, and I do not know to-day whether they are in favor of or opposed to this bill. I do not know how it may be with the other members of that committee in reference to the opinions they hold on the subject; but I have no doubt that they have acted with equal independence of the Navy Department. And as to the gentleman from Maryland, I do not know what his relations are with the Navy Department, further than from the indication he gave yesterday and last session I was led to suppose that they are unfriendly. I say, with all respect to him, that I neither know nor care whether he is friendly or unfriendly to the gentleman at the head of the Navy Department.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman does not mean to make, of course, reference to my relations with the Navy Department.

Mr. PIKE. I have said that I know nothing about them except what he stated in his place here. He said further, by way of illustration, that the Naval Committee had spent a large portion of their time—so I understood him—at the last session running around the country to find a location for a navy-yard, and that that matter had better be committed to professional hands; which is doubtless true. But let me state that I, sir, as a member of that committee, took part in that examination, or most of it; and I will say to the gentleman and to the House that, although I did attend the committee on a trip to look at a site for a navy-yard, and came back with that committee, I was absent during the whole of the last session only one single sitting of the House upon the business of searching for a site for a navy-yard.

Such allegations, sir, by the distinguished gentleman from Maryland seemed to me to call for a reply; for a gentleman who can be so careless in his statement of facts about his associate members upon this floor, can hardly expect that his statement upon other and more important matters shall be implicitly relied upon.

But all these matters are personal and unimportant. The gentleman from Maryland propounded a grave question to this House, and that was, "Have we a Navy?"—a question not to be answered by eloquence nor by brilliant declamation. If it were, I should decline to interpose my rude speech. But, sir, a ship-of-war is, as Mr. Carlyle says, a "great fact." Ay, sir, a perfect ship-of-war is a great fact which has been sought for by all maritime nations for centuries; and it is because it rests among facts and not among theories, that I propose to discuss briefly the important question he has propounded.

The gentleman says that not only have we no considerable Navy, but we have no organization by which that result can be brought about. That is a statement of fact, which, if true, in view of the not improbable contingencies of a foreign war, it is well for this House now and here to discuss, in order to ascertain whether the allegation be correct.

It is a preliminary question whether or not there is an organization that in the future can produce a respectable Navy. The gentleman from Maryland has produced his plan. Here it is: a board of naval administration which is to be a panacea for all the ills under which we now suffer. I hold in my hand the original measure, but which I understand has been modified somewhat since. It provides that the vice admiral and four other officers of the Navy shall constitute a board, and that that board shall have the advising of the construction and management of the Navy.

It is proposed to make this board permanent, for the smaller experiments which have been tried from time to time in the Navy Department, and which is an ordinary and almost daily means of obtaining the opinion of an advisory board, will not satisfy the gentleman. He must have this a permanent board, under the appointment of the President and sanction of the Senate. So he would retire our distinguished vice admiral from active service, and take him and four or five other distinguished officers of the Navy and lay them up in ordinary here, imposing upon them simply the duty of advising the Secretary of the Navy, which advice he may or may not be expected, in his discretion, to follow. In addition to the serious objection of retiring so many good officers, we can readily imagine the conflicting views which will arise, the discordant councils, and the balancing and shifting of responsibility from the head of the Navy Department to the naval board, and back again from the naval board to the Secretary of the Navy. Either one or the other of them must be responsible. It will not be as it is now, where you have provided your Secretary of the Navy with heads of bureaus who shall advise him of all the details of their particular departments. If the Secretary desires to contract for a ship he goes to the head of the Bureau of Construction, of whom Admiral Du Pont said, "The nation is largely indebted to him for his valuable services in constructing our best vessels, and under any other form of government he would long ago have been knighted."

If the Secretary wishes to contract for the construction of an engine he applies to the head of the bureau whose special duty it is to attend to that particular thing. If he wants to act in other directions, he inquires of the admirals and other experienced and able officers who are at the head of the other bureaus, and taking their advice singly and collectively, as he does from time to time, he makes up his opinion and acts accordingly. Thus you have the principle of individual and strict responsibility, and at the same time have all the benefit of consultation and advice which could possibly be obtained from an advisory board of the character proposed.

Board of Admiralty—Mr. Pike.

It is asked now that we shall change all this; and why? Why, because other maritime nations have done so. We should call in a Board of Admiralty because England has had a Board of Admiralty, and the gentleman from Maryland has copied his plan partially from that of England and partly from that of France.

Well, sir, the Board of Admiralty at the time of its creation in England was progress and reform. Bad as it is it was better than its predecessor. It succeeded the Lord High Admiral. He was a prince of the blood. The office was held by a natural son of Henry VIII when he was but eight years of age, and afterward by various branches of the dull family who at present occupy the British throne.

Sir, it was progress and reform to take the management of the navy out of such hands, and place it under the control of the British Board of Admiralty. These reforms do occasionally occur in Great Britain. But one considerable reform satisfies that moderate people for a century; and this organization is nearly two centuries old, and it is time, as it is worn out, corrupt, and effete, that it should give place to a modern organization that shall free itself from existing errors, and answer the purposes of the present generation.

Sir, I cannot say, as my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Rice] said yesterday, that I have no prejudices upon this subject. I am frank to confess that I have prejudices, and of two systems equally good, the one our American system, and the other an English system, I confess that my prejudices would lead me always to select the American system. But, sir, I do not wish to depend upon prejudices. I wish to produce here authority for what I say about the British Admiralty. I took occasion the other day when this subject came up to go into the Library, and found there only three books upon this subject, and I examined them to see what intelligent British criticism had to say about this Board of Admiralty. I do not propose to cite from those authorities at length; but I invoke the attention of the House to some brief extracts. And the first is a book published in London about four years ago, entitled Admiralty Administration, by a very intelligent author, who, if I mistake not, is a distinguished naval officer. He says of this Board of Admiralty:

"It is most important to remember that this distribution of business is an internal arrangement by which the board delegates to its several members a portion of its own duties; that each member is responsible to the board, and to the board alone, for his performance of those duties; and that for each and all of those duties the responsibility upon Parliament and the country is that not of the individual lord, but of the board in its collective capacity."

That is precisely applicable to this bill. Well, what was the effect? This writer describes the effect; he says:

"It is unnecessary to insist at any length on the evil of divided councils, which must often occur among six persons brought together by the chapter of accidents, without previous knowledge of each other's views, and in fact the Admiralty often represents nothing so completely as the endless diversity of opinions which prevail among naval officers; a diversity which on the other hand is partly accounted for by the absence of any standard course of policy to be discovered in the conduct of successive naval administrations."

And he winds up by saying:

"With respect to naval officers the case is not more encouraging, for the only one subject on which there is general agreement among them is the utter hopelessness of any good result arising from a system which is felt to hang like a blight over the navy."

Now, sir, I hold in my hand a series of letters written by a distinguished British admiral, Sir Charles Napier, in which he describes this system, having served under it for a long period. Let us see what he says about it. He says:

"I have been forty years in the service; and with the exception of commanders of sloops, first lieutenants, senior midshipmen of ships of the line and frigates, being promoted in consequence of the capture of a superior or equal force, I have seldom observed anything like common justice in the distribution of promotion. First lieutenants might be the best and most zealous officers in the service —that was seldom a sufficient recommendation for promotion."

Again, sir, he says:

"What Sir George Cockburn, Sir George Clark, and I believe Sir Bismarck Martin foretold, has come to pass. There is no responsibility whatever, for the responsibility of six gentlemen composing the Board of Admiralty is not worth a straw. May I ask your lordship who is responsible for the millions of money thrown away in building an inefficient steam navy; who is responsible for the iron steam fleet that the Admiralty do not know what to do with? It was only the other day that, raising a tank and the dunnage under it, in one of these precious vessels, they found a hole in her bottom through which the water passed, and a fish in it, on which, if I am not mistaken, one of their lordships breakfasted."

And again:

"Believing, as I do, that no permanent good can be done for the service until the Board of Admiralty is abolished, I shall point out what appears to me would be the best mode of ruling the navy, although that step has not been taken."

And that mode, sir, was to have one head of the navy, on whom the undivided responsibility of its management should rest.

So much for Sir Charles Napier. I now read from another book entitled Our Naval Position and Policy, written also by a naval officer, and published in London in 1859; and this is what he says upon the subject. He quotes from Sir George Cockburn, and approves the sentiment:

"Having filled the station of confidential or principal Sea Lord of the Admiralty for more than seventeen years, I feel that my opinion regarding the constitution of the board may sooner or later be deemed worthy of consideration and attention. I am induced, therefore, to place in writing the decisions to which my experience has brought me on this point."

"I have no hesitation in stating that I consider the present establishment of that board to be the most unsatisfactory and least efficient for its purpose that could have been devised."

So much for the authority of intelligent British criticism upon the Admiralty Board of England.

Suppose, now, that you examine that board in the light of their accomplishments. What did the board do when the great transition came from sailing vessels to steam? It was tried, as our present Navy has been tried, by war. They had the Crimean war, in which England and France combined, and the universal opinion of naval writers was that the naval administration of Great Britain was a failure. The Admiralty Board only covered themselves with ridicule by building a hundred and fifty extra and useless gunboats and parading them before the public after the war was over, to show that there was still some life left in the old board.

And how was it, sir, with regard to the iron-clads, the second transition period of the Navy? They had long years the start of us. Twenty-odd years ago we began one single battery, and there we stopped with it still on the stocks in New Jersey. We saw no need of any further efforts in that direction, and made none. But England and France both began to arm themselves in this new mode of naval warfare, and what was the result? I do not call upon my prejudices for an answer. I have it here from British authority. I will ask the Clerk to read an extract from one of the best naval mechanical magazines in Great Britain, the London Mechanics' Magazine.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The event foreshadowed in the Mechanics' Magazine more than two years since is close at hand. The fleet of experimental iron-clads, of which the Warrior is the type, must, if they are to be in a condition to cope with the armor-plated ships of foreign Powers, be reconstructed. What a bitter sarcasm is this announcement on Admiralty management! The Warrior has been held up to the admiration of the naval world as the most perfect specimen of a screw iron-clad frigate. Quite recently, it was represented on Whitehall authority, that 'her excellent sea-going qualities and rate of speed under steam were unrivalled,' and she was 'just in such splendid order in her internal arrangements as can only be attained by unremitting exertions at the close of an ordinary term of commission.' It seems incredible that this magnificent vessel, which, we are told, the Admiralty officials 'feel a just pride in calling the finest and fastest of her Majesty's iron-clad fleet,' is suddenly discovered to be utterly defenseless as a ship-of-war."

"We were prepared for this discovery. While she was still under construction we pointed out that the unprotected condition of her bows and stern would be fatal to her in action, as it would enable a completely armored antagonist to make a wreck of her two ends, and in her crippled state leave her no choice but destruction or surrender. Repeatedly, to that effect were urged on the notice of the Admiralty, but all regarded with sublime indifference by 'my lords' and their noble secretary. A reconstruc-tion was in vain; the square fighting box, occupying two hundred feet in length of the center of the ship, was a capital invention. The batteries and the gunners were safe in this iron forress; the arrangement was perfection, nothing could be better. The comptroller and his staff were jubilant; they treated with disdain the sinister predictions of professional and civilian critics, and, not content with one experimental iron-clad on the fighting-box system, costing nearly half a million, they induced the Admiralty to order three others on the same principle. Four ships, at a cost of nearly a million and a half, were built on an untried plan, and now, after their completion, by a trial, which might and ought to have been made long before the first of the number was ready for sea, it is discovered that the objectors, whose opinions were treated with scorn, are right, and the plan is a failure."

"The recent shell practice against the target-ship Alfred, at Portsmouth, has suddenly opened the eyes of the 'lords' who witnessed it to the unpleasant fact that a Warrior with her bows and stern unprotected by iron armor would be no match for a Gloire, much less for a Couronne or a Magenta."

"A panic has seized the comptroller of the navy and his chief constructor, and spread to the board. The fear of Parliament is before their eyes. Hastily, 'the Warrior is to be paid out of commission, and is ordered to be thoroughly dismantled, everything being returned to store, and her machinery taken to pieces.' Three reasons are spoken of as having influenced the Admiralty in paying her out of commission: 'First, want of men for the three-decker Victoria; secondly, the defective condition of the ship's boilers; and, thirdly, the intended alterations and continuation of the armor-plating around the bows and stern.' The two first reasons are mere pretexts—the last is the true one. At length the murder is out. The famous Warrior, the splendid iron-clad, cannot meet an enemy without being doomed to destruction and without disgracing England's flag. The remedy is a bitter pill for the Government to swallow; but there is no avoiding it. The Warrior must be reconstructed; and this will commence the reconstruction of our entire iron-clad navy. The Warrior or elastic system of armor plating—iron on wood backing—which, with slight modification, is adopted for every plated ship, as we have frequently shown, is defective in principle, and must be replaced by a system of greater rigidity. The expense will be enormous, but it is unavoidable."

"The intended alteration to the Warrior's bow and stern will necessitate the opening and lengthening of the ship's frame forward and aft, otherwise she would be unable to carry the additional armor-plating, and would be ruined in her present excellent sea-going qualities and speed. In plain words, it is found necessary to cut the Warrior into three parts, and reunite them by splicing (to use a familiar term) at both ends. This work will necessitate the removal of the armor-plates and backing at the two extremities of the ship, the reconstruction and replating of the latter, and probably alterations in the masting and rigging. These changes will involve great expense, and may be seriously prejudicial to the trim of the vessel. Three other iron-clads on the same plan will have to be reconstructed."

"But worse still remains to be told. What is to be done with Mr. Reed's fleet of wooden bottoms and unprotected ends, carrying square iron fighting-boxes on the Warrior plan, but with such instability of structure that the iron top sides vibrate alarmingly from the fire of the ship's guns, with armor that will hardly resist 68-pounders at short ranges, and with the hamper of movable bulkheads on deck? If the formidable Warrior cannot encounter an enemy without being reconstructed, what is to become of the ships of the Research and Enterprise class, of which eight were built or laid on the stocks before one was tried? They have neither strength nor speed, are neither liners nor cruisers, and cannot by any process of reconstruction be converted into serviceable craft. With these prospects before us, the condition of the navy is by no means satisfactory."

Mr. PIKE. Such, Mr. Chairman, is the naval administration of Great Britain in theory, and such when tried in practice. Is there anything in it, in theory or in accomplishment, that should induce us to copy from it? Shall this young and thrifty nation take a graft from that old and worn-out tree for the purpose of improving the fruit that we should produce?

But the system now proposed to be introduced partakes not only of the characteristics of the English Board of Admiralty, but it partakes also of those of the French board, and the authority of the French board is cited here to influence this House in its action. Sir, the French board is about thirty years old. It was adopted on the recommendation of a committee of the French parliament. It has been changed, and it has brought about a result which has alarmed Great Britain. But has it done anything as yet in time of actual war? La Normandie rolled and tumbled across the ocean to Vera Cruz, and after straining and leaking, to the great joy of everybody on board got back to France. Besides this feat, what else has France done? And of what use is it to talk about the organization of the French board? I hold in my hand an English book devoted to the subject of naval administration, in which the adoption, in part, of the French board is advocated. But after discussing the subject, the writer says frankly:

"But it is to be borne in mind that, though a change in the constitution of the French admiralty did much, there is also much due to the peculiar talents and character of Napoleon III. We might possibly import the whole French system (as we always want to export our talkative Gov-ement) and belike the wise man who bought all Punch's show but forgot to buy the man inside."

As to the French board and the whole French navy, as Louis the Grand said of the State so may Louis Napoleon say of the navy: "La marine—c'est moi." And unless we propose to introduce him too, I see no reason why we should copy from the French system. France has never yet been a first-class maritime country. She has but a million tons of shipping against some five or six millions of English tonnage and about an equal amount of American tonnage; but she has accomplished a formidable navy, considered in the light of an attack on Great Britain. The great question between those two Powers is the possession of the English Channel. That raises the fears and quickens the exertions of one side or the other. No blow is struck at Cherbourg without thinking of Portsmouth, and no bolt is driven at Portsmouth without thinking of Cherbourg.

Such, Mr. Chairman, are the systems abroad. Is there anything in them, or in either of them, or in their performances, that should induce this House to copy them?

And now we come to our own system. Let us see what it has done, and whether it is worthy of the general condemnation pronounced upon it. We have tried heretofore copies of foreign systems, and they have failed. We have had our "Maritime Committee," our "Continental Navy Board," our "Board of Admiralty," our "Board of Naval Commissioners;" we tried the last thoroughly for twenty-seven years; and by universal assent they were all given up for the present system, which has been in operation since the year 1842 or 1843.

Now, sir, it is well to test the system in the two ways I have indicated: first, by its theory, of which I have spoken; and, secondly, by the results it has produced. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] has tried it by its results. That is a fair way of trying it. And now let us see what our naval administration has done in the present war. What was the first necessity in 1861 when the war broke out? It was necessary to have a blockade, and as a first step it was necessary to have ships-of-war to carry out that blockade. It was the blockade of a coast of three thousand five hundred miles in extent; and Lord Lyons inquired of Mr. Seward with incredulity whether he really was in earnest in proposing to blockade a coast of that extent. Sir, it was a great undertaking. And I submit that the Navy Department, when tried by this test, fulfilled its purposes. That blockade has been strictly enforced according to the latest decisions upon the subject; it has been effectual. It has been tried by the opinion of foreign Powers, and has been pronounced by them to be an effectual blockade; and the result upon the confederacy, the result upon prices abroad, and the result upon prices here at home, show that it has been effectual; and I have no doubt the suffering English owner of many a captured blockade runner has unwillingly confessed to himself that the blockade was really strictly enforced. In order to accomplish this, it was necessary that the commercial marine of the country should be called upon, and vessels were purchased for that purpose. Hence come the large list of purchased vessels upon which the gentleman from Maryland commented yesterday.

What was the next necessity? That the Navy should assist the Army in reducing the southern forts. Has not that been accomplished? What is the list of naval efforts but an almost constant succession of victories? With the almost single exception of the unfortunate attack upon Charleston, the flag has been triumphant everywhere. What more could have been done under any naval administration? Why, sir, in the last affair at Fort Fisher the concentrated fire from that whole fleet produced a result which is described in the rebel newspapers as a shower of shot and shell such as has never been equaled since the invention of gunpowder. And I may add an important fact, which has not been generally considered, that all of the guns upon the sea-face of that fort were dismantled by the fire from the navy; that not one of them at the time of the attack of the land forces remained in position; there was but a single howitzer that could act offensively upon the land forces when they made the attack.

And, sir, in addition to this, we have furnished cruisers which have perambulated the sea, and have rescued our commerce from the grasp of the British pirates. Sir, in these important respects your naval administration has been a decided success. Does anybody suppose that the slow-moving discussions of an aristocratic and conceited board of admiralty would have resulted as well?

But, sir, it is complained that, notwithstanding the naval administration has been a success in these particulars, it has failed in want of preparation for a foreign war. If this were so it would not be wonderful. Suppose it to be true that the gunboats that have been used to patrol the western waters for a length of three thousand five hundred miles are unfit to go to sea, is that anything remarkable? Suppose it to be true that the double-enders, which have been used for the shallow rivers and narrow inlets of the South, are exposed in their machinery on account of their light draught of water, is that anything to be surprised at? Was not the expenditure upon them made for a temporary purpose, and should the money have been reserved and taken away from a present and pressing necessity, to be applied to a future and possible contingency? Would that have been wise? Why, sir, I hardly think that even the British Board of Admiralty would have committed so stupid a blunder. Sir, the first great duty was to aid in the suppression of the rebellion; the next duty was to prepare for the possible contingency of foreign war. Well, sir, suppose that we are to have the foreign war, which many suppose will follow the suppression of the rebellion; suppose that, upon the suppression of the rebellion, Great Britain refuses to accede to our just demands, and a foreign war is brought on, and is hard pressing upon us, what is our first necessity? I submit to gentlemen of this House, what is the first necessity in case of such foreign war? Why, sir, it is the same necessity that has been felt in England for the last century: it is to defend your own ports.

Now, I ask whether or not the system of naval administration in this country has not provided for that defense? Speak as you may of the monitor system; denounce it as you may as a sea-going system; speak of it as you may as a system of attack; speak of it as the gentleman from Maryland did yesterday when he said that between the discharges of the guns at Fort McAllister the rebel officers appeared upon the parapets and smoked their cigars; say that the system is slow for that purpose; that these long intervals between the discharges destroy the efficiency of the attack; that you need a rapid, a concentrated, and an overwhelming fire for the purpose of disabling a garrison; but do these objections apply to the monitor system as adapted to repelling an attack? Take these forty-seven monitors which are now completed, or in rapid progress toward completion, and tell me, would not Boston feel safer, and New York feel safer, and Baltimore feel safer, if they had each half a dozen of these vessels within their respective harbors at the time of the declaration of a foreign war? Why, sir, you need only look back to see the applications from various ports and from the authorities of various cities for these iron-clads for the purpose of defense when a war did threaten abroad, and when it was even supposed that some of the rebel cruisers might visit our northern harbors—from these earnest applications you learn the intelligent opinion of the country.

And let me say two things in reference to the monitor system, which answer all the charges made against it. There are two things which have already passed into the history of the country, and which, if the whole system should now be thrown away as useless, would justify the whole expense and ten times more.

The first of these was the check given to the furious raid of the rebel iron-clad steamer Merrimac. You will recall the consternation which prevailed throughout the land. You will remember the alarm created by the telegram from General Wool from Fortress Monroe. You will think of the overwhelming anxiety which prevailed in the northern cities when it was learned that the Merrimac had easily destroyed the Congress and the Cumberland, and that there was nothing to prevent her entering any northern harbor and attacking any of our cities where there was sufficient depth of water to admit her. Think of all this, and then estimate values. I was here at that time, and remember what I saw at the other end of the avenue and at this end, and I have no doubt that millions of dollars would have been contributed and tens of millions voted at that time to have that vessel destroyed.

The history of the monitor is not unfamiliar to the House. It illustrates our mode of building vessels. In July, 1861, the Secretary of the Navy recommended an appropriation to make experiments in iron-clads. Congress made an appropriation of $1,500,000, and provided by law that it should be placed under the direction of a board. That board considered the subject of iron-clads. It was headed by one of our most intelligent and respectable admirals. So little did they think of these monitor iron-clads, even as a means of defense, that they reported they would only accept Ericsson's as he offered it for $275,000, provided he would run his own risk. It is part of the history of the country that the iron-clad Merrimac was driven back by a vessel acting on the responsibility of a private individual. Yes, sir, quite a large portion of that moderate compensation of $275,000 was held back to await the decision of that important naval conflict. And, sir, I may state, what I understand to be a fact, and to illustrate the position that all the naval wisdom is not confined to a board of distinguished officers, that that board—as able, perhaps, as any that could be gathered in the Navy—stated to the Secretary as their opinion that the probable wants of the service in this rebellion would be twenty-five new vessels!

The gentleman from Maryland, if I understand him, talks of the wasteful expense of the Navy. I hold in my hand an extract from a leading London paper, the Star, showing the expense here as compared with that of England. I will read it:

"Not the least interesting portion of the lengthened annual report of the President is his summary of the condition, the work, and the expense of the Navy during three years of the war. It seems that the Federal Navy now consists of 671 vessels, carrying 4,610 guns, and manned by 51,000 officers and seamen. This necessarily includes those gunboats which have been designed for the service of the Mississippi and similar great rivers; nor can we separate the iron-clads of the monitor class from sea-going ships. That the latter are not only numerous but effective is shown by their capture during the past year of 324 vessels, which must necessarily have been almost all blockade runners. The naval captures since the war commenced number 1,379, of which 267 were steamers, and the prize money already declared amounts to upward of £3,500,000, which does not include many claims in course of adjudication. The preparation and expense of this vast fleet since the war began have amounted to £47,700,000, which is scarcely credible in view of the fact that our navy, without any vast outlay for the production of new vessels and during a season of peace, has cost during the same period £48,000,000. We commend the fact to the notice of Mr. Gladstone in the preparation of his new budget."

That shows that our Navy, during a season of war, has not cost as much money by millions as the British navy during a season of profound peace. And you learn from the report of one of the chiefs of bureaus, one of the admirals I have spoken of, the difference the Department finds between paper and gold, as he says that he was compelled to pay a contractor $1,250,000 in currency for materials for his department which the same contractor would furnish for $500,000 in gold. If you put the Department upon the English gold basis, instead of the total sum named by the President, we should have at least thirty-three per cent. less expenditure here than in England. Would that British Board of Admiralty have done better?

I have specified one of the things accomplished by the monitors, in the repulse of the Merrimac. Another result, of equal and probably of much greater importance, was that the monitors saved us from foreign intervention. When the news of that combat down in Hampton Roads was flashed across the country, it was thought there was no limit to the possibilities of the monitor system.

If a monitor could stand as that little vessel stood and receive the battering and hammering it received, and repel the attempt to run it down, it was capable of almost anything, it was thought, and greatly exaggerated importance was attached to it in the public mind. That same exaggerated opinion crossed the Atlantic, and the London Times, in view of that combat, said they had but four ships in the British navy. The matter appeared in Parliament, and a distinguished gentleman on the floor said, referring to that combat, that they had no navy. The chairman of one of their committees to examine into the matter of iron-clads, Sir John C. Hay, said:

"The man who goes into action in a wooden ship is a fool, and the man who sends him there is a villain."

Of course, sir, if England had no navy she could not for a moment think of interfering in our war.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Admiral Farragut took Mobile with wooden ships.

Mr. PIKE. He declined to make the attack until he obtained the iron-clads.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. But he made the attack with wooden vessels.

Mr. PIKE. But it was the heavy guns of the iron-clads that disabled the Tennessee, and that determined the result of the naval fight in the bay of Mobile.

Well, sir, that fight in Hampton Roads saved us from intervention at that time. But subsequently the pendulum of public opinion swung the other way. The numerous criticisms upon iron-clads and upon the monitor system depressed the public mind as much as it had been previously elevated, and it came to the conclusion, particularly after the attack on Charleston, that the monitors were of comparatively little consequence. A similar revolution of public opinion took place in England, and that princely conceit which had been temporarily dethroned after the fight at Hampton Roads resumed its usual sway in the British mind. They came to the conclusion that there need be no fear of the American iron-clads, and that the exaggerated importance attached to them was mainly in consequence of Yankee bragging.

So the British Government allowed Mr. Laird to go on and build iron-clad vessels for the rebel service. Mr. Adams, our minister, applied to Lord John Russell to put a stop to it, but he failed to satisfy Lord John by his testimony. Mr. Adams furnished further testimony, but still he failed to convince the British minister. In the mean time the fight occurred in the Savannah river, where the Atlanta, built upon British principles, came out to attack one of these monitors, the Weehawken, when the gallant John Rodgers, by five shots from the monitor's fifteen-inch gun, destroyed her efficiency as a vessel-of-war, and obliged her to show the white flag. The success of the Weehawken rang across the Atlantic, and Lord John said they had proof enough, and the building of British iron-clads was stopped, and Mr. Laird was never afterward able to furnish them to the rebels. That was a critical period in our history, and we should never forget one of the adjuncts by which we were able to escape its dangers.

Sir, I have great respect for the correspondence of the Secretary of State. I was not of those who, the other day, thought it was fit and wise for the interests of this country to remove the control of our foreign affairs from that Department at the other end of the avenue and transfer it to this House. But high as my respect is for the distinguished gentleman at the head of that Department, and highly as I appreciate his efforts to keep peace with England, I place a higher value upon our humble monitor, and in my judgment the country would make a poor exchange to swap off a monitor for a dispatch.

Well, sir, as I said, in case of a foreign war the first necessity is defense. I have spoken of our means of defense and of the power of our forty-seven monitors. Our next necessity would be a fleet for the purpose of destroying foreign shipping. And we have a fleet for that purpose.

Why, sir, after eliminating, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] did yesterday, from our six hundred and seventy-one vessels, and taking out those which he considered worthless, we still have enough left to destroy all foreign commerce. We have forty-seven double-enders of about a thousand tons burden, and carrying heavy armaments. These vessels have already proved their efficiency in this war. They were referred to yesterday in connection with their speed, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Rice] told you how fast they were. I have here a memorandum of the speed of other vessels of that class besides the Eutaw, to which he referred, and it shows that they readily reach thirteen and thirteen and a half knots an hour—very fast for war vessels. They have proved their value in the fight in Mobile bay and in the attack on Fort Fisher; and we all recollect how gallantly and efficiently the Sassacus ran into the rebel ram Albemarle, and would have destroyed her had she been properly supported by others of the fleet.

"I have found the double-enders a much better class of vessels than they have been represented to me. Indeed, for the purpose for which they were intended (as river boats) they are capital vessels, and have only one defect. That is, they do not fire their guns straight ahead. This defect can be easily remedied by cutting a port in the bow, which any commander would be justified in doing when the necessity arises.

"There is a wide difference between the contract double-enders and those built by the Government. The latter are strong and substantial. Some of them are of great speed, and if not quite equal in this respect to the blockade runners they have proved themselves faster than the best rebel privateers.

"Two of the double-enders had their boilers pierced by shot, but that did not put a stop to their operations. They were in every fight afterward, and made quite as much speed as was necessary under one boiler, and good speed at that.

"In action I found the batteries of these vessels very effective, from the fact that I could place them as close as it was possible to go, near the shoals. Each one could bring six heavy guns to bear from one side, which made four of these vessels equal in broadside guns to one of the heavy frigates, the Wabash firing twenty-three nine-inch guns, and a hundred and fifty-pounder pivot from her broadside, while four double-enders fired sixteen nine-inch guns and eight one hundred-pounder rifles, or eleven-inch guns, from a broadside, the favor in guns being on the side of the four double-enders, and the strength and power of endurance being on the side of the frigates.

"For operating in rivers, for which purpose they were intended, these vessels are good, substantial ones, and could be perfectly well adapted to the work required of them, with very little alteration, and those built by Government can go anywhere and at any time."

Besides these double-enders we have forty-four sea-going vessels of from three hundred and fifty to nine hundred tons. Of some of the smaller of these, such as the Yantic, Nyack, and vessels of that class, Admiral Porter says:

"These vessels, though, have proved themselves a perfect success as steam gunboats. They are fast, steady at sea, and come up in every respect to the requirements of a good vessel-of-war. They will all average eleven knots, are of light draught, and will enter most of these southern harbors at high water. I do not think that they have canvas enough to cruise under sail alone, and the sail is only serviceable to them in very fresh breezes, or in lying to in a gale. As sea-boats these vessels are unsurpassed."

And in addition to these we have forty-four vessels building or already built, ranging from twelve hundred and fifty to three thousand seven hundred and thirteen tons. Will not that be an effective fleet? These vessels are built with reference to speed, and are capable of accomplishing two results, to destroy all foreign commerce unarmed, and to fight and overcome armed vessels equal or inferior, and escape from superiors. They are in part upon the stocks and in part already launched. They embody the true idea of a cruiser, to fight or run as they deem best. If they do not make fifteen knots an hour they will disappoint everybody concerned in them, and if they make anything near that they will be smarter than any vessel in the British navy, while they are of sufficient size to carry a most formidable armament.

Sir, compare the destruction caused by the Alabama alone, a vessel of very ordinary capacity, with the immense destruction that would be effected by any one of these powerful cruisers, and it is not extravagant to assert that this fleet of ours could sweep from the ocean in sixty days after a declaration of war all the commerce of an enemy.

Mr. ASILEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for ten or fifteen minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. PIKE. Well, these are the two most important objects to accomplish: in the first place, to provide for our own defense; and in the second place, to attack our adversaries.

I have spoken of these cruisers for the purpose of attacking foreign commerce and inferior vessels-of-war. I presume that we are not to repeat the experiment that Napoleon failed to try of an invasion of England with Boulogne as a base. I presume that we shall not attempt the invasion of any foreign country; but in case of a war with any Power holding possessions on this side of the Atlantic, it may be necessary to have vessels powerful in the fight as well as cruisers. Well, sir, we have such vessels in our Navy. Why, sir, besides these forty-seven monitors of the smaller type, we have thirteen of a larger type, from fifteen hundred and sixty-four to thirty-two hundred tons, and how effectual these vessels are we know from actual experiment; their power does not rest on theory only.

Sir, I hold in my hand the published letter of Admiral Porter, a man who has not only a hereditary claim to the consideration of this nation, but a man whose achievements have been twice during this war of so important a character as to receive the unanimous thanks of Congress. His opinion is of value, and what does he say upon the monitor system? I know some landsmen critics object to his style of writing, but so long as the country is as well content as now with his style of fighting they will be lenient to any peculiarities of the gallant sailor's composition. Why, of the Monadnock, one of the smallest of this class of monitors, he says:

"As to the Monadnock, she could ride out a gale at anchor in the Atlantic ocean. She is certainly a most perfect success so far as the hull and machinery are concerned, and is only defective in some minor details, which in the building of these vessels require the superintendence of a thorough seaman and a practical and ingenious man."

"The Monadnock is capable of crossing the ocean alone, (when her compasses are once adjusted properly,) and could destroy any vessel in the French or British navy, lay their towns under contribution, and return again (provided she could pick up coal) without fear of being followed. She could certainly clear any harbor on our coast of blockaders, in case we were at war with a foreign Power. As strong and thick as the sides of this vessel are, one heavy shot from Fort Fisher indented the iron on her side armor, without, however, doing any material damage. These vessels have laid five days under a fire from Fort Fisher, anchored less than eight hundred yards off, and though fired at a great deal, they were seldom hit, and received no injury, except to boats and light matter about decks, which were pretty well cut to pieces."

Now, sir, if a little monitor of fifteen hundred tons, and the only one of the monitors at Fort Fisher, be it added, which was constructed in a navy-yard, could accomplish results like this, what may not be expected from monitors of the larger size built upon very nearly the same plan, but with those improvements which experience has suggested?

But suppose that a collision comes between war vessel and war vessel; suppose that in a great naval war, when it comes in the future, we are to have a conflict between vessels built on the American pattern and vessels of English construction, what then? No sensible man supposes these iron monsters are to roam the seas in droves like the cheap wooden ships of our last naval war; but suppose they do and the conflict comes, and fleet meets fleet? We shall have our broadside vessels, the Dunderberg and the New Ironsides. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] says the New Ironsides is a success. I hope so. But the British Admiralty, as I have already said, have sent the Warrior, of a similar make, into dock to be built over again. Good or bad, we shall have these. Porter has recorded his opinion that "in a fight, the Ironsides would be no match for the Monadnock." Besides these we shall have our turreted fleet—turrets covered with fifteen inches of iron and holding guns capable of throwing masses of iron of four hundred and fifty pounds' weight. When the twenty-inch guns are got afloat they will send half a ton of metal at a discharge. Can the Warrior and her consorts resist that? With sides so high out of water that any gunner can hit them, how long will these monstrous globes of iron rap against the four and five-inch iron covering before gaining admittance? Sir, last year a single blow from a fifteen-inch gun shattered, at the Washington navy-yard, the best six-inch plate of French iron that could be procured. Why will it not repeat that result in the great naval conflict?

I confess, sir, as a man who loves the sea, and has been among vessels from boyhood, I appreciate a sailor's prejudice against these ungainly craft. I would willingly enter into convention with all naval Powers and agree never to fight in iron-clad ships. They reverse all one's ideas of seamanship and destroy the poetry of the seas.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

National Currency—Mr. Broomall.

HO. OF REPS.

But it is not a question of sentiment—it is one of fact. And although untried, what reason have we to doubt the result? For one, sir, I should look to the result of that great day in which the hostile iron-clad navies of the world were engaged—a day which will never come—with confidence that the uncouth turret would come out triumphant over the broadside antagonist of Europe. The day, sir, I feel confident, would be one of “disastrous memory” only to the foes of the Republic.

I have not deemed it worth while to speak of the blunders of the Navy Department. These general results I have spoken of are sufficient to vindicate its management. That it has blundered who doubts? But in this particular is it far in advance of the other Departments of this Government? And if we are to follow the English example and put it in commission, because of blunders, why not pursue it further and put all blunders in commission? Where should we stop? Would Congress be untouched?

Sir, let us have done with this folly and be content with a good result, and one of which the nation should be proud, rather than pursue phantoms of perfection which are unattainable.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. BROOMALL,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1865.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BROOMALL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: At the last session of Congress several attempts were made to lessen the prices of the necessities of life by fixing that of gold; or rather by so regulating the dealings in gold as to bring down the price of that article, and by that means reducing the prices of other commodities. Satisfied that such legislation could only result in evil, but not wishing to occupy the time of the House in argument, I contented myself with simply opposing the enactments with little beyond my vote. But seeing the same measures brought forward at the present session, and by a gentleman whose long experience and known abilities would cause one to hesitate before hazarding an opinion in opposition to his, and believing his views to be those of many thinking and unthinking people, I cannot forbear the expression of mine. If my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] is right, I shall thereby afford myself the opportunity of being convinced by the arguments I hope to draw out upon that side of the question. On the other hand, if he and those who think with him are in error, they are in error upon a subject which, above all others, should at this time be fully and generally understood.

There is nothing which more seriously demands the attention of Congress than the condition of the currency of the country. That there is a fault somewhere all believe. That somehow the price of gold is connected with that fault is also universally admitted. But the nature of the connection and the remedy for the fault have brought out a strange diversity of opinion. The prices of most of the necessities of life have doubled within the last four years. Some have increased fourfold. The expense of living is beginning to bear hard upon men of moderate means; and those who are living upon fixed incomes and salaries find their slender resources diminished in effect to a half or a third. Supplies for the Army are obtained only at enormous rates; and no matter what margin is allowed for contingencies in the estimates, Congress is constantly called upon to pass deficiency bills to cover some unforeseen rise of prices. In the mean time enormous fortunes are made, or apparently made, out of the morbidly stimulated condition of trade; and the capital thus accumulated in unaccustomed hands finds employment in the most extravagant living or in the wildest speculations. The evils are manifest enough; and if the remedy is in the power of Congress it is quite time for us to seek it and apply it. With this view I intend to examine some of the measures proposed to that end, and some of the opinions expressed by gentlemen upon this floor, and in so doing modestly to give my own.

My colleague to whom I have already alluded, and for whose opinions on all other subjects I entertain the highest respect, ascribes the high prices of everything else to the high price of gold, and that to the infamous practices of brokers and gamblers. In an apparent fit of despondency he says of these practices:

“Let this conspiracy go on, making sad havoc of the best interests of the nation, compelling the poor and the rich to pay three prices for the necessities of life, compelling the Government to pay three prices for all its supplies and munitions of war, and swelling the amount of the public debt; while we sit here bound, helpless, trembling before the descendants of the sweat-cloth tribe of money-changers who were driven from the temple.”

All this is very pretty and eloquent; and the earnestness of my colleague, as well as his known probity and sincerity, would almost incline one to think he believes the hypothesis upon which it is based. But a little examination will show that hypothesis to be wholly without foundation.

The theory is twofold: first, that gold gambling keeps up the price of gold; and second, that that keeps up the price of everything else. Now, gold gambling is simply betting upon the price at which gold will sell on some fixed future day, though the form of it is that of purchase and sale. A contracts with B to deliver him $1,000 in gold, at the expiration of thirty days, for $2 40 per gold dollar. On the day of delivery if gold has fallen to $2 30 A gains $100; if it has risen to $2 50 he loses $100; and instead of delivering the gold he simply pays or receives, as the case may be, the difference between the contract price and the market price for the day. No gold passes between the parties; none is needed, for the transaction is understood from its inception to be one in which only the loss is to be paid, and that in currency.

This is a fair illustration of the gambling which is supposed to have so terrible an effect upon the price of corn and gunpowder, measured in Government notes. Like all other gambling, it is pernicious enough, and is a fit subject for prohibitory State legislation. But, wide-spread as its baneful moral influence is, its pecuniary evils extend to few beyond the actors themselves; their aim and end is to cheat one another and such unwary strangers as they can delude into their clutches. We shall only mislead ourselves if we endeavor to find the cause of high prices in the gambling dens of New York.

I repeat, there is no form of gold gambling that is not resolvable into betting upon the price of gold on a future day; and I have failed to see how this, in itself, can affect the price of gold, any more than betting upon the weather can make any future day wet or dry, warm or cold. The process requires no gold for its performance. It creates neither demand nor supply. It has no bearing whatever upon any of the elements of price.

It will be answered, however, that B, in my illustration, has an interest in causing an increased price of gold at the end of the thirty days, and that he will combine with others who have made similar contracts to enhance the price. This I grant, and this consideration leads me to say that gambling, of itself, has no effect upon the price of gold. The evils are usually ascribed to the practices of the parties during the running of their contract. B will of course combine with others to put up the price. But in the mean time what will A, and those who have made similar contracts to his, do? Simply combine to bring down the price.

Now, it must be borne in mind that for every one who has contracted to deliver gold at a given price on a future day, somebody has contracted to receive it. It may therefore be fairly estimated that one half the gamblers are constantly striving to put gold up and the other half to bring it down; and who shall say which will outmaster the other, the bulls or the bears, at any given point of time? Sometimes one class succeeds to a small extent, sometimes the other; but in a series of cases, as well as in many individual instances, their efforts are neutralized, and the resulting effect is simply nothing.

The allegation is, that the gamblers as a body combine to enhance the price. Those who have the most limited knowledge of stock operations will find it difficult to conceive such a combination, embracing both the bulls and the bears. A in my illustration would hardly conspire with B to enhance the price, any more than B with A to lower it. It is not the interest of gamblers as a body that gold should either rise or fall. Their interest at all times is divided. Fluctuation in price, if price be the subject-matter of betting, is not necessary, though danger of fluctuation is. What the business needs is uncertainty. The same amount of betting will be done while the price is stationary for a long time together, whenever half the bettors believe it will change, and are willing “to back their opinion with a wager.” Neither is an enhanced price peculiarly favorable to gambling. Just as much money will be lost and won with gold at 90, as at 290.

Having shown that it is not the interest of gamblers to put or keep up the price of gold, I will now show that, granting the interest, their power to do it is so small as to be almost inappreciable, and that regular speculators in gold are just as powerless as gamblers. Commodities are indeed enhanced in price by combinations of dealers to buy up the market, and so create a scarcity. This has sometimes been done with breadstuffs, to the loss of the community, though often to the ruin and deserved punishment of the conspirators. It has been done, too, with other merchandise. The operation is only successful with articles of which both the demand and supply are limited, and articles most difficult of transportation. Gold belongs to neither of these classes. Of all commodities it is of the most general use, and its purpose the most uniform. Of all articles much in use it is the easiest transported. The natural tendency of everything toward the highest market is more apparent and immediate in gold than in anything else. Its fluency is like that of water; and the attempt to buy up the gold market would be like that to drain the Potomac by dipping or pumping. Yet in both these cases some effect would be produced by persistent and combined efforts. All I maintain is that the effect would be inappreciable.

Suppose such an attempt should be made by the entire horde of New York brokers combined. The whole commercial world and the whole mining interests would conspire to thwart them. If gold should thereby become more valuable in New York than in Boston, Philadelphia, Liverpool, a constant stream of it would flow in from all quarters to restore the disturbed balance. There is such a constant stream without this. New York received, during the past year, from various places in our own country, exclusive of the mines, $28,000,000; and transmitted it all to Europe for a better market.

It must also be borne in mind that we are a gold-producing people. That article forms a prominent constituent of our exports. From the port of New York alone in 1864, under the very nose of these supposed forestallers, $51,000,000 of gold, embracing $13,000,000 from the mines, actually went abroad in search of a higher market than that which is supposed to be kept up by artificial and fraudulent means.

The value of an article for export is its true exchangeable value at the place of export, where the article is one of continued traffic and general use; and all the efforts of all the brokers' boards and gamblers in Christendom cannot vary its price from that exchangeable value, except to a small extent and for a limited period.

This brings me to another branch of the subject. We are told, not by my colleague, but by those who think as he reasons, that gold in this country is too dear. If by this is meant that the difference in exchangeable value between gold and currency is too great, I most heartily assent. But it is worth while to inquire whether the fault may not be on the side of the currency. Is gold too dear? Is its exchangeable value higher here than in the rest of the commercial world? If so, why does it continue to be exported? Men do not ordinarily buy in a higher and sell in a lower market for the purpose of making money. An article of continued transport from New York to Liverpool must be cheaper in the former place than in the latter by at least the cost and risk of transportation and the loss of time.

It requires very little reflection to expose the fallacy of the position I am now combating.

Measured in breadstuffs and in labor, the price of gold has not risen. Measured in cotton and woolen fabrics, in groceries and most other articles of merchandise, it has actually fallen. But my colleague in the elegant extract I have cited, says, or implies, that it is this artificially raised price of gold that puts and keeps up the prices of all other things. Not only gold is too high, but wheat, beef, potatoes, clothing, "and all the supplies and munitions of war;" and the price of gold is to blame for all the mischief.

It is very remarkable that the only stable thing in the country is the currency; that greenbacks alone keep their true value, while everything else runs wild. When the boat and wharf separate, I might believe the former stationary and the latter moving if it were not for the perplexing circumstance that in that event, the trees, the houses, and everything else but the boat, move also. The drunkard and the lunatic think the singularity exists in everybody but themselves. Indeed, where divergence is apparent it requires some intoxication or some insanity to keep one from suspecting that the change exists at the point where the least change is required to produce the observed effects.

Seeing, then, that the exchangeable value of gold, measured in everything else but currency, has continued substantially the same, except where causes susceptible of explanation and unconnected with the currency have effected a difference; and seeing, too, that everything else has risen in price when measured in currency, I naturally turn to the point where the smallest change would produce the phenomena, and inquire how far the whole fault may be traced to the condition of the currency.

If the proposition had been made to Congress to debase the coin of the country by a gradual process, so that at the end of two years it should possess only thirty-five per cent of its former weight and fineness, no one would have thought for a moment of entertaining it. The increase of prices and consequent feverish excitement given to trade; the derangement of all regular business; the absolute destruction of so large a proportion of all securities for money, would have been results so monstrous and apparent that such a proposition would have been indignantly spurned by the most superficial thinker. If, in addition to this, it had been proposed to restore the original weight and fineness by a like gradual process, extending through the next four or five years, so that all contracts to pay money entered into during the debasement should be carried out at or toward the restored standard, thus making every debtor pay once and a half or twice what he contracted to pay; and so that all property of all kinds would sink in the hands of the holder; if to this had been added the proposition that the Government should borrow its $2,000,000,000 in the debased coin, and pay interest upon it in the old coinage, thus paying at a rate amounting, at its maximum, to seventeen and seven eighths per cent., and should further obligate itself to repay the principal at maturity in the same old coinage, thus paying at the maximum nearly two hundred and ninety-eight dollars for every one hundred borrowed, it is hardly likely that these features would have rendered the measure any less unpalatable. And yet this is precisely what has been and is being done.

There is no use in disguising from ourselves the real condition of the currency. We are called upon to legislate for an existing state of things; and the only way to do that with effect and for the good of the country is to begin by understanding what that state of things is. But gentlemen upon this floor and elsewhere, and the papers of the day, have adopted, as if by design, a language calculated to hide the truth even from themselves. They talk of the high price of gold, of breadstuffs, of fabrics, of stocks, of labor, instead of the low exchangeable value of their debased currency. They attribute these evils to combinations of bad men, made for the purpose of cheating the Government and the people. They ascribe the enormous rates of exchange to plots on the part of foreign merchants and capitalists to embarrass our Government and force its dissolution. They accuse traitors and sympathisers with treason in our midst of depreciating the currency by predicting ultimate repudiation; and they fail to see that the whole mischief has its root in what was probably necessary, but certainly very unfortunate, legislation.

At the beginning of our national troubles the Government found the currency of the country quite sufficiently inflated, as is shown by the unconvertibility of the bank issues which followed, the banks suspending specie payments in December, 1861. Engaged in a gigantic struggle for its existence, the Government must have money. Time and deliberation were necessary to perfect and enforce a system of national taxation, and time and deliberation were just the elements the Government could not afford. Its necessities were imperative. Money must be had, and that at once. Two resources suggested themselves: borrowing upon its interest-bearing bonds, and issuing its currency notes. The former was difficult, except at very high rates of interest, but it was possible, for loans at some rate of interest can always be obtained. But blending the two would afford an immediate supply, and the latter means would facilitate the former; for with the currency sufficiently inflated loans could be negotiated without much regard to the interest offered. This blending of the two resources was the course adopted by the Government, whether wisely or unwisely history will determine.

By a series of enactments extending from July 15, 1861, to June 30, 1864, Congress authorized the emission of $60,000,000 of notes payable on demand; $600,000,000 of notes not so payable, but made a legal tender for all purposes except the payment of duties; $600,000,000 of notes bearing interest, and made a legal tender to the extent of the principal except for the payment of duties, and $50,000,000 of postal and fractional currency, making altogether $1,310,000,000. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and from other reliable information, I find the amount actually issued under these various acts, up to November 1, 1864, to have been $736,000,000. The demand notes have been nearly all redeemed and wholly withdrawn from circulation. This leaves $676,000,000 of the following kinds: $433,000,000 of United States notes not bearing interest; $59,000,000 of five per cent. notes due in one and two years; $61,000,000 of five per cent. coupon notes, and $102,000,000 of six per cent. compound-interest notes.

As far as the interest-bearing notes are held as investments, they are not to be considered as part of the currency; but as far as they are held by banks or individuals in the place of other notes, liable to be paid out, and only selected for holding on account of their higher value, they are. No doubt this entire issue will gradually disappear from circulation when and as its value relatively increases; but at present it would not be safe to estimate more than half the amount as having left the circulation and added itself to the investments of the country. Taking half the interest-bearing notes from the foregoing figures, and there remains of national paper money $565,000,000 liable to circulation. To this must be added the national bank issues, amounting now to $89,000,000, and the issues of the State banks, which one year ago were $170,000,000, but are probably now reduced to $100,000,000. This will make the probable paper circulation of the country $754,000,000.

Now, the entire paper currency of the country before the war, including the States in rebellion, may be set down at $200,000,000—more frequently falling below than exceeding that sum. From 1856 to 1860 there was comparatively little change, though the tendency was upward. At the latter date the amount was $207,000,000. The average amount for ten years preceding 1860 was $193,000,000. Of this amount, according to the Bankers' Magazine, about one fourth belonged to the States in rebellion. This leaves about $150,000,000 as the normal volume of paper money at the gold standard of the scope of country now containing a Government and bank circulation of $754,000,000.

It will readily be admitted that an increased demand for currency even at the gold standard has been caused by the events of the past four years; but this must not be over estimated. The Government is but employing and paying men who were to a great extent employed and paid in the various departments of industry before the war. Even in furnishing supplies, at least to a part of the extent, the Government is but conducting a business heretofore performed by individuals. In both the branches, however, it is fair to say the business is transacted to a much greater extent by means of currency than the like amount in ordinary times.

It is also true that the increased prices of commodities render a larger volume of currency necessary for the same number, amount, and frequency of exchanges. And as far as the increased prices are owing to the withdrawal of so much labor from the fields of production, this circumstance is fairly to be taken into the account, because the increased volume to this extent would be needed if there were no inflation, and would cause none. But it will not do to take into the account of allowance the high prices that are caused by the inflation itself in an effort to ascertain the amount of the inflation.

It will be urged that the whole $754,000,000 are not in actual circulation, part of it, constantly varying, being in the Treasury and the various depositories. But the same may be said of the bank issues before the rebellion and indeed of all currencies under all circumstances. Part of the volume, constantly varying, is on deposit in the vaults of banks and individuals dealing in or producing the article. Something may, however, be due to this circumstance, and the actual amount may be decreased to compensate for any supposed peculiarity of the present system in this respect.

It is impossible more than to guess how much allowance, or whether any, should be made on all these accounts. There are, however, some matters for which due allowance must be made. The area of the present circulation has been extended by our recent victories so as to embrace territory in which the estimated amount of $150,000,000 in 1860 did not circulate. This extension, however, has been mainly effected since the period of culmination in the price of gold. Its effect is exactly that of contraction, and I apprehend the increasing tightness of the money market in the commercial cities, and the fall of gold, are in some degree owing to this cause, though probably quite as much to the gradual withdrawal from circulation of the compound-interest notes.

Part of the excess of issue also has taken the place of the coin which has disappeared. Coin, however, always formed but a small portion of the actual circulation, probably never exceeding a fifteenth of the present volume.

If we allow half the currency as a compensation for all these circumstances, there will remain $378,000,000 to perform the functions heretofore performed by $150,000,000 at the gold standard. This liberal estimate will show an inflation of twice and a half, quite sufficient to account for the price of gold and most other commodities.

If any one doubts the position that so enormous an increase of the paper money of the country would result in its depreciation, let him read the financial history of England during the bank restriction which extended from 1800 to 1821. The issues of the Bank of England during the ten years prior to 1800 averaged $55,000,000, and during the ten years subsequent to 1821, $100,000,000. Between those dates, during the suspension, the issues averaged about $109,000,000. Taking the average of both extremes as the test of the wants of the people at the gold standard, the expansion was forty-one per cent.; and this was partly absorbed by the increase of business and the disappearance of coin. Yet with all the financial ability of the managers of the Bank of England, aided by the Government, and bent toward the single end of preventing a depreciation, the price of gold continued during all those twenty years above its nominal value in paper, and at one time it reached a premium of thirty-three and a half per cent.

If this is not sufficient, turn to the history of France during its experiment of national currency.

Up to August, 1793, the revolutionary Government of that country had issued $1,000,000,000 of assignats, and at that date had in circulation $750,000,000 of them. These were made a legal tender, and every effort was made to force their circulation at par. Yet in 1795 they had depreciated to one fortieth of their nominal value; and in 1796, when the issue amounted to $9,000,000,000, $1,000 of them were required to purchase one dollar in gold. Utter repudiation became a necessary consequence and speedily followed. This is an extreme case, and I cite it to show, what probably all will admit, that an unconvertible paper circulation beyond the wants of the community must depreciate.

I should despise myself if I could for a moment harbor a suspicion that the Government of my country would follow the mad example of the French regicides. No, our currency will be redeemed as our debt will be paid at its full nominal value; and the country, prospering as it did for many years in spite of the policy of the late dominant party, will be very little the poorer of the operation. Young and vigorous, the Republic has shown itself capable of surviving a vast deal of ruining. But it is well to point out the rock upon which other financial policies split, that we may not only avoid it but avoid it by measures least hurtful in their remedial effects.

To restate the proposition: we have abolished the old currency of the country which, with occasional exceptions, had a fixed exchangeable value in the entire commercial world measured in other currencies, and have adopted a new one of a lower and uncertain standard here and of no exchangeable value elsewhere. Thus cut loose from the currencies of the rest of the world, ours has been left to find its own exchangeable value under the operation of laws arising out of supply and demand, and applicable as well to currencies as to all other exchangeable things. This process of finding its standard may be the work of time, during which there may be many oscillations, each probably of less extent than its predecessor; and the standard, when ultimately found, if not found already, will be a fluctuating one.

I do not believe that any considerable part of the depreciation of the currency is owing to doubt about its ultimate redemption. I think there is no such doubt. I find no evidence or trace of it anywhere; and if such doubt existed, the effect of it in depreciating the currency would be very slight as long as there is none other. The people must have a currency, and one known to be wholly worthless for all other purposes would retain its value for making exchanges if there were none other to take its place. If the distrust of a currency should exclude it, should force dealers to find some other medium or means of exchange, then I grant its exchangeable value will fall to what it may be worth for other purposes. But while it constitutes the currency it is subject to all the laws of trade that fix the value of currency.

It is well settled that an irredeemable paper medium of exchange can only be used as the currency of its community at a standard fixed by its volume compared with the number, amount, and frequency of exchanges to be made by it, affected always, one way or the other, by the degree of mutual public confidence, that is to say, by the disposition to require cash payments or otherwise. Hence, all other things being equal, if the volume be increased, prices will rise; if the volume be decreased, prices will fall.

An interesting illustration of the depreciation of currency consequent upon its inflation may be found in the period of the suspension of the Bank of England, from 1800 to 1821, exclusive. If we divide this period into three parts, such that the middle one will cover the period of greatest expansion, that is to say, from 1811 to 1817, exclusive, and estimate the proper amount of currency at the gold standard for each of these periods, by taking the average amount for the decades before and after the suspension, and apportioning the increase between the decades, among those periods, we will find that during the first period the expansion was twenty-eight per cent., and the premium on gold four and a half; during the second, the expansion was fifty-nine, and the premium nineteen and a fifth; and during the third, the expansion was thirty-two, and the premium two and a third.

Taking each year by itself will show the same result, but not with the same regularity. Many causes operate to produce temporary fluctuation, and it is only by taking a series of years that these causes are got rid of by balancing one another.

If it be asked why the premium on gold and the amount per cent. of inflation are not found equal, or more nearly so, the answer is that part of the excess of issue was absorbed by the increase of business arising out of the war, and part went to make up the deficiency occasioned by the disappearance of gold. In every case of inflation these causes operate, or rather always the latter, and always the former or a similar one; and unless they are neutralized by other elements they prevent the actual expansion in paper from having its full effect on prices.

I have no complaint to make of the policy of the Government in regard to the currency, though I regret that an apparently overruling necessity induced the adoption of the system of inflation, and I would not have that system outlast for a moment the necessity. Possibly, if its full consequences had been foreseen, some modification of it might have been made in the beginning. Possibly it might have been cheaper to the Government in the end, and less disastrous to the people, to have contracted the loans at a much higher and certain rate from the beginning than to have inflated the currency with the hope of borrowing such enormous sums at six per cent.—a hope which has proved so delusive since the six per cent. contracted for has proved to be ten, twelve, and in many cases fifteen. A system by which forty dollars are borrowed upon an obligation to pay six dollars per annum interest, and one hundred dollars at maturity, will hardly be extolled for its economy.

Recognizing the magnitude of the evil, the Committee of Ways and Means during the last session of Congress devised a remedy. These gentlemen had been watching the gold market from day to day until they began to believe the whole mischief concentrated in the board of brokers. Their temper became like that of the farmer who blew the vane from his barn with a shot-gun because it would obstinately and persistently point northeast. Following their train of thought, the committee proposed to drive the money-changers from the temple, not in the manner of Him of old, but by putting the Secretary of the Treasury in to their exclusion. They proposed to allow the Government to enter the lists with the brokers and to buy and sell gold ad libitum, with the expectation that everybody else would then quit it, and that gold, left to itself, would fall to the price they thought it ought to stand at, about 130. Congress, yielding to the persuasive eloquence of the committee, adopted their views and passed the law. The morning papers were sought for with an avidity only incident to these marvelous times. But behold! instead of gold behaving itself as it should have done under the chastisement, it had actually risen! Days passed, and the rise continued. One, two, five, and twenty per cent. were added to the former figures; not as a consequence of the enactment, but in defiance of it and under the influence of other causes.

Baffled in this attempt the committee now proposed more vigorous treatment. A law must be passed punishing every one who presumed to buy or sell gold except for present cash, and accompanied by present delivery; and Congress again acquiesced. Unlike the former, this scheme was not exactly "whistling against the wind." It had at least the merit of not being wholly inoperative. The Government had by law compelled the payment of duties in gold; and as the merchants could not make the article they were forced to buy it. Unable any longer to engage it beforehand for the time of need it was common prudence in them to buy and hold until their duties became payable. This created an unusual demand and the price went up to its maximum at 297½. Alarmed, and not reflecting that this artificial state of things could only continue until the extraordinary demand had been once supplied, Congress repealed the law, and the demand subsiding, gold fell to its proper exchangeable value in the commercial world.

This it was supposed would end legislation on the subject in that direction. It was thought that Congress would direct its attention to the actual disease, and if it found no remedy would at least cease to do no mischief by doctoring the mere symptoms. What, then, was the surprise both of this body and the country when my colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] so preëminently right upon all other questions, brought forward at the present session a similar measure, though much more severe and thorough in its details. He had somehow failed to learn by the experience of last winter. He had become befogged in the mazes of Wall street and had worked himself into the condition of mind of the physician who, by mechanical force, compelled his patient's pulse to beat exactly seventy to the minute, as it should do, and supposed he had thereby cured the fever.

As if believing that what has been once tried is worth trying again on a recurrence of the circumstances, though it be even the punishment of witchcraft and heresy, my colleague proposed to adopt the provisions of the British statute of July, 1811, by which buying or selling gold, except at par, was made a penal offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment. The House, however, rather uncourtously, laid the bill on the table without examination. Discouraged in what he still considers a good work, my colleague thereupon tells us, in effect, that he will abandon all attempt at our reformation, and leave us to our own destruction.

The effect of such a law may be ascertained by a priori reasoning, as well as by observing its operation in England. There is a legitimate and proper trade in gold, as well as the pernicious one of gambling. Certain of the arts and manufactures require it. Duties as well as the balance of exchange must be paid in gold. There is also a constant trade in it between our mines and foreign countries through the exporting cities. It may be said that this latter business could be left unfettered by restricting the law to coin. But so restricted the law would be useless, since a blacksmith's fire will reduce coin to bullion, and the laboratory of a chemist probably to gold dust.

Now, this legitimate demand will be supplied, and ought to be. Suppose the law should be obeyed. Then the holder of gold, whether received from the mines or from the Government as interest on its bonds, must export it to sell it; for no man would expect him to take one dollar here for what would bring him two in Liverpool; and the artisan or mechanic who needs it in his business must buy it in the foreign market. This would add twice the cost of transportation to the already high price. But suppose the law should not be obeyed, as is the more probable, then the high-minded and honorable dealers would cease to supply the market, and the business would fall exclusively into the hands of men less scrupulous. These men would not only charge enough to cover the risk of detection and punishment, but they would combine to enhance the price still further. This they could do with perfect success, because all open and legitimate trade being prevented by the law, no outside supply could flow in to prevent forestalling. In either case, therefore, gold would rise.

Now, let us see what the effect actually was in England. The law was passed in 1811 and continued until after 1821. My colleague [Mr. STEVENS] says:

"I do not say that the measure was an entire cure of the evil, for such is not history. But it was a great palliation of it, and instead of gold reaching 250 it stopped at the rate it had attained."

My colleague has slightly mistaken the facts. The average price of gold in 1811 was 108.50. Notwithstanding the law, it rose in 1812 to 123.64; in 1813 to 129.71; in 1814 to 133.55; in 1815 and 1816 it stood at 120.66. It was not until 1817, after a change had taken place in the whole face of Europe, that the price fell to 102.74. A glance at these figures is not calculated to impress one with a high degree of confidence in my colleague's remedy. Now, I do not say that the rise in price was owing to the enactment, for many and complicated causes were in operation during that period, but I do say that the enforcement of such a law, in the absence of other causes, would effect a rise in the price of the subject-matter.

My colleague says that gold in England did not, as here, go up to 250. This is true, and the inflation of the currency in England was not, as here, to twice its natural volume. It is worthy of remark that while the average circulation in England during the suspension was $109,000,000, yet during the eight years, from 1810 to 1817 inclusive, embracing the period of the highest price of gold, the circulation averaged $130,000,000.

Turn now to the history of the same experiment in France. In 1793, when the paper circulation of that country was $750,000,000, and was increasing at the rate of $50,000,000 per month, the Convention enacted a law punishing by six years' imprisonment in irons any one who should exchange paper for gold, except at par, or should ask or receive a higher price for goods in paper than in gold. Yet this stringent law had no effect to stay the depreciation, and in less than two years, according to Alison, a dinner for a single man cost $2,000 in paper.

But the high price of gold is not in itself an evil. On the contrary, it is part of the remedy which the laws of trade provide for a preëxistent evil. If, by some forcible means, some trick of legislation, gold should be brought below its true value here, the effect would be to stimulate importations, and to draw the gold abroad to pay for them. Our only means of retaining it in sufficient quantities for governmental and individual uses is to leave it entirely to the laws of trade. The actual evil is the high price of all necessities of life to individuals, of supplies and munitions of war to the Government, the high rates of interest on the gold-bearing bonds, and the fearful discount at which the Government is borrowing.

Such being the evil, and its magnitude being granted, what is the remedy? I answer, the one we are already applying, and if its remedial effects have not this far been sufficiently obvious it is because the administration of it has not been sufficiently vigorous. I allude to the twofold remedy of fighting and taxation, furnishing men to the Army and money to the Government; men and not substitutes, money in taxes and not loans only. Enable our armies to follow up their recent glorious victories and end the war. Enable the Government to redeem its currency in gold as soon and as fast as the public necessities will permit. This may be difficult, but it is the only remedy, and the sooner the Representatives of the people see it the better. We are in a better condition to pay taxes now than we will be for years after the termination of the war, and we are willing to pay them. That is the significant meaning of the November election. Some complaint has been heard of the inequality of taxation, but none of its amount. The people have not undertaken to support their Government without counting the cost, and they have overrated neither their strength to fight nor their ability to pay.

Probably there ought to be no great contraction of the currency during the war, but certainly there ought to be no further expansion. The only excuse for inflation in the beginning was the immediate necessity for money before it could be raised by taxation. The time of that excuse has gone by, and if further resort to the expedient should be forced upon the Government the responsibility must rest upon the Representatives of the people.

The circulation of the State banks might with very great propriety be dispensed with at once. The necessities of the Government will not afford the advantages of furnishing the currency to be reaped by any but itself. A stamp of one per cent. required to be put by the bank or the holder on every note before issuing or passing it, to be canceled with the date and renewed every six months, would effect this object; or if it should fail, would at least yield a large revenue. The facilities generally afforded the State institutions to avail themselves of the national law are such that they could not complain, and the community would be glad to get rid of this heterogeneous element.

Let us then take measures to prevent the further expansion of the currency and to commence the work of contraction. Supply the Government with the means to pay not only its interest but such part of the current war expenses as will remove the necessity for further issue of notes. Let us so shape things that on the restoration of peace our immense debt both of bonds and currency will be already in process of liquidation.

The inflation of the currency and the necessary subsequent contraction work an especial injury to those who labor for their livelihood. Dealers of all kinds and most men of business derive advantages from the inflation to compensate for their losses during the contraction. Not so the laborer. He has no stock on hand to be increased in price. His commodity is at the increased cost when he is ready to dispose of it. It is true he receives an advance of wages, but every article he has to buy is enhanced in price in a greater proportion. This is partially but not wholly remedied by the withdrawal of so many men from productive industry to fill the armies, so that wages are now higher than they would be under the operation of inflation only.

Not benefited, then, by the expansion, the contraction will fall doubly hard upon the laborer. Who will employ him to furnish products for a falling market? The return of the soldiers, too, will make competition in his ranks for the little he can find to do, grinding him down to the point at which the most fortunate laborer can barely live. What to him will be the fall of the necessities of life if he can obtain nothing wherewith to buy them? What to him will be the cheapening of other men's commodities if he can find no market for his own?

It must not be expected that a return to the gold standard, no matter how gradual, will be effected without serious financial embarrassments. The entire line of artificial prosperity of the last four years will have to be run backward. Every debt will be increased to the debtor, while remaining nominally the same. Every commodity will fall in price in the hands of the holder. Dealers will fear to buy, and trade for the time will be almost suspended. Everything salable will be forced into a market in which there will be few buyers. Labor will seek employment for mere bread; and the day that sees the redemption of the Government issues in gold will be one of terrible financial calamity.

But the gold standard once fairly reached, and the state of the country once adapted to it, the energies of the people will unfold themselves anew. Business of all kinds will reopen; capital will re-ally itself to enterprise; thrifty employment will seek well-paid labor, and our country will commence a career of progress surpassing everything even in her own glorious history.

I cannot conclude without speaking of one of the benefits arising out of these scenes of trouble, to compensate as far as the future can for the expenditure of blood and treasure in the present. I allude to the system of national banking. We have at last discovered that there is meaning in that clause of the Constitution which gives to the national Government the power to regulate the currency by authorizing Congress to coin money and fix its value. Never again will that power be intrusted to States and State corporations, under whose imperfect management each neighborhood had its local currency, often unknown and uncredited at the distance of a few miles. The great Republic, created in 1789, had suffered politicians to play with its powers until it seemed the mere servant of sovereign States. But the duty of self-defense aroused its slumbering strength, and events are in progress demonstrating that in one country there can be but one supreme power. States have rights, counties have rights, towns have rights, individuals have rights; but the Government of the Union, charged with the preservation alike of the rights of the States and the people, alone is sovereign. The Republic of America is proving itself a nation.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

SPEECH OF HON. A. HARDING, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 31, 1865.

The House having resumed the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House, on the 14th of last June, rejected Senate joint resolution No. 16, submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. HARDING said:

Mr. SPEAKER: If the subject under consideration did not involve consequences so grave and serious, it would be amusing to witness the changes lately made by certain gentlemen on this floor, and the reasons given for them.

One reason, assigned by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, is, that though it may be doubtful whether there is power to abolish slavery by an amendment to the Constitution; though it may be oppressive and unjust to a particular State, yet if not done now an extra session will be called and the measure consummated; whether right or wrong it will be done after a time, and why retard it? Sir, you have to reflect but for a moment to see where that argument will lead. It will justify lawlessness, bloodshed, violence, and every outrage known to the catalogue of crime. Sir, with every fair-minded and conscientious man the question is, whether the measure is right, just, and constitutional.

The ground taken by another Democratic gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] in justification of his course, was that the question of so amending the Constitution as to abolish slavery was considered in the Baltimore Convention and incorporated into its platform; and that in the election of Mr. Lincoln, the nominees of that Convention, the people of the United States had declared in favor of the abolition of slavery. But if the gentleman is sustained by that consideration, it must be on the ground that a majority of his district voted for Mr. Lincoln, and sustained him on the platform for the abolition of slavery by an amendment to the Constitution. But, sir, the very reason that would sustain that gentleman in voting for this resolution would crush others, and among them my colleague, [Mr. YEAMAN.]

Now, sir, in the second congressional district of Kentucky, represented by my colleague, [Mr. YEAMAN,] the majority against this measure, against President Lincoln and the abolition policy of his Administration, was four thousand six hundred and fifteen. How, then, does my colleague from the second district feel himself justified in coming out in favor of this amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery upon the ground assumed by the gentleman from New York? The people of his district have by a majority vote of four thousand six hundred and fifteen decided against it; how, then, can he vote for it?

And another of my colleagues, [Mr. SMITH,] from the sixth district, has come out in favor of this amendment, although the people of his district in the late presidential election decided against it and against Mr. Lincoln by a majority of two thousand five hundred and thirty-seven votes. That gentleman, in a speech in this House a short time since, in substance remarked that "he was not to be held responsible for opinions which he held and advocated some time ago." Certainly not. Who ever thought of holding that gentleman responsible for his past opinions? Most unquestionably I never did. Has anybody been deceived or mistaken in him? I have not. If some gentlemen were not to turn around and change their front, I should be mistaken. Not at all, therefore, do I hold the gentleman responsible for his past opinions. It is just what I should expect of him; and I should have been deceived if he had not changed.

And then, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ROLLINS,] after telling us that he was born in the good old land of Kentucky, and reared under the teachings of her Clays and Crittendens, comes out and volunteers his advice to Kentuckians; and very patronizingly asks us to imitate his changing example.

That I may do the gentleman no injustice, I beg leave to read a few extracts from his speech, setting forth his changes and his recantations. He says in that speech:

"It will never do, in the day of civil war and revolution, to be justifying one's self for inconsistency. Men change every day. Read the inaugural address of President Lincoln; read the diplomatic correspondence of the distinguished Secretary of State; read your own speeches of two or three years back, and you will see how changes have taken place. Read my speeches, and you will find me preaching a short time ago one doctrine, and now preaching another. I am proud that a man has the right to change."

Yes, sir; a short time ago preaching one doctrine, and now preaching another; "driven to and fro by every wind of doctrine; ever learning, and never able to come to the truth; trying all things, proving all things," and holding fast to nothing. [Laughter.]

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

HO. OF REPS.

Truth is eternal, and principles do not change. Yet some gentlemen have the greatest facility for assuming different dresses. They throw off one set of opinions and assume another as readily as a man relieves himself of a worn garment and puts on another. When a man puts on a borrowed coat it never fits exactly; and he feels inclined to change just as often as he can borrow. And so it is when a man, having no matured and fixed principles of his own, assumes and acts upon the opinions of others; they bear his expenses but a short distance; he soon throws them off and puts on some other man's opinions. But I deny that human nature has changed in such cases as the gentleman asserts. There has been no real change in the man; not at all. On the contrary, some gentlemen must be changed to keep them from changing. [Laughter.] They must be regenerated and born again, or they will exhibit such changes.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROLLINS] also says in the speech from which I have read:

"I have been looking up for light from above, and I begin to see it streaking along the horizon, however it may be with other gentlemen in this Hall."

Yes, sir, the scales begin to fall from his eyes; he sees men as trees walking. Perhaps the gentleman could not exhibit stronger evidence of the insanity of fanaticism than this claim to supernatural illumination. But he sees streaks of light. When Lucifer fell from the regions of light, possibly he may have been followed a short distance by some rays of light, but they were pursuing him downward to the regions of outer darkness and eternal night. And so the streaks of light the gentleman perceives may be the emanations from his former position, following him in his downward fall.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to a short paragraph from a newspaper, the Baltimore Sun, which I send to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.—A movement is on foot among prominent Philadelphians of both political parties to give a handsome dinner to those Democratic Congressmen who shall vote in favor of the proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting slavery. So far the list of such members embraces the names of GEORGE H. YEAMAN of Kentucky, AUSTIN A. KING and JAMES S. ROLLINS of Missouri, MOSES F. ODELL and JOHN A. GRISWOLD of New York, MYER STROUSE, JOSIAH BAILY, and ARCHIBALD McALLISTER of Pennsylvania, and EZRA WHEELER of Wisconsin."

Mr. HARDING. I think it will be seen when the vote is taken that there is a mistake in that article, at least as to some of the gentlemen named.

But the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROLLINS] says "he is proud that a man has the right to change." Who ever denied his right to change? Who would expect anything else of him? After the exhibition he gives of himself, it is not at all strange that he should change. But is it not passing strange that the gentleman should invite Kentuckians to follow him in his wayward and erratic course? Sir, I should never overtake him; I could not hope to see him to-morrow where I find him to-day. If I were to start with him to that dinner at Philadelphia, by the time I could get in sight of the table he would be seated and dining with Wendell Phillips in Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on the other side of the House exult and rejoice a great deal over the new abolition converts, who are going over from this side of the House into their ranks. But I would admonish gentlemen to be a little careful how they receive them. It is a rule in one of our churches to receive new members only on six months' trial. It might be judicious to imitate that example and receive certain gentlemen into their ranks only on six or seven years' trial. Perhaps it would be safe to do so.

Then, sir, there is an old saying among farmers and teamsters, that a horse that has broken the harness and run away once will run again. And they never trust him afterward. If they work him at all, it is at the "off wheel" through mudholes and bad roads; but they never trust him for a single moment as a leader; for they know, that having run once, if he gets the least chance he will be certain to run again.

Again we are told that the "human heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked," and it is not going too far to say that these young converts may have human hearts.

Mr. Speaker, we were told by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ODELL], in his speech some days ago, that the reason why the question of amending the Constitution so as to abolish slavery was considered in the Baltimore Convention and incorporated into its platform, was because the President and the party sustaining him had grave doubts as to the constitutionality of the emancipation proclamation. And to relieve themselves of these doubts they determined to change the Constitution. Sir, what reason was there for any doubt on the subject? Did not the President and his Secretaries, and did not Congress proclaim to the country, again and again, and in every imaginable form of language, that there was no purpose, and no constitutional power in any department of the Federal Government, to interfere with slavery in any State of the Union? And did not Secretary Seward go so far as to say that any attempt on the part of the President to do so would be arrested by the courts on account of its manifest unconstitutionality, even though assented to by Congress and the people? Yet in the face of all these positive declarations, coming from every quarter and in every form of language, the emancipation proclamation was issued. Sir, was there any room for doubt? Did not its authors know it to be unconstitutional?

But suppose the subject to have been surrounded only by grave doubts of its constitutionality, what then? Sir, when I take an oath to support the Constitution I do it as a conscientious man; and when called on to do an act that I consider of doubtful constitutionality the doubt goes to my oath. And who would do an act that would leave it doubtful in his own mind whether he had taken upon his conscience the guilt of perjury?

Mr. Speaker, we were told by the President that the oath to support the Constitution embraced the whole Constitution, the clause providing for the return of fugitive slaves as well as the rest; and that "to the proposition that the fugitive slave shall be returned to his master the oaths of all members of Congress are unanimous." And yet, in a short time afterward, we find the fugitive slave law repealed, and the return of the fugitive prohibited under a heavy penalty. Sir, it is in this way that the Constitution has been trampled under foot, torn, and inflected, and today it is to be crucified in the house of its professed friends. And why, and for what? Because these gentlemen cannot bear the purity of its doctrines. It testifies against them. It rises up in judgment against this Administration and condemns it. It must therefore be struck down, and its voice forever silenced, that it may no longer testify against the acts of this Administration.

Mr. Speaker, the State of Kentucky is now the only State that has any interest in this question, and I deny that the proposed amendment, though passed by Congress and ratified by three fourths of the States, will have any constitutional or binding force on Kentucky unless she also ratifies it. I deny the power to make such an amendment and force it on any State of the Union. The right to the absolute control of slavery and all other domestic institutions is reserved to the States; it is but the right of local self-government, and never was surrendered or delegated in any way to the Federal Government. These reserved rights never can be wrested from any State but by the hand of violence and revolution. Gentlemen contend that there is no limitation on the power of amendment; that any change in the Constitution can be made which may be proposed by Congress and ratified by three fourths of the States, though all the others oppose it. I deny it. If under the claim of amending the Constitution you can change or destroy one domestic institution of a State, you can destroy any other or all of them. If, in defiance of the constitution and laws of Kentucky, you can take from the people of that State their entire property in slaves and emancipate them, you can by the same power take from them their property in lands also. They have no better nor more secure title to the one than the other. If you can do this in one State you can in another. If you can abolish slavery in Kentucky, it follows of necessity that you can establish it in Massachusetts and force it upon the people of that State.

Although the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] contended earnestly for the power, by amendment, to abolish slavery, yet when asked whether there was power by an amendment to establish slavery in Massachusetts, he denied that there was any such constitutional power, and said he would resist it to the last. In saying this he gave a conclusive answer to his own argument; he yielded and conceded the whole question in debate. I say there is neither power to abolish slavery in the one State, nor to establish it in the other.

But gentlemen contend that there is no limitation on the power to amend; therefore, by the action of Congress and three fourths of the States, any or all of the reserved rights of the other States may be changed or entirely swept away. They say that by an amendment proposed by Congress and ratified by three fourths of the States a monarchy can be established, a king crowned and forced upon the other States, and that all this is constitutional. Manifestly the power contended for is a power to subvert and destroy, not to amend.

The argument is, that it is constitutional to destroy the Constitution. But, sir, all legitimate and constitutional amendments must have reference to, and be consistent with, the great fundamental principles and framework of the Government. A power to utterly destroy the Government we have, and to establish another and entirely different one on its ruins, was never given; nor does it at all enter into the idea of a constitutional amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the doctrine of secession has justly been regarded as odious, and why? Because it was a claim that a part of the States had the right to secede whenever they might choose, and thus destroy a Government formed for the protection and benefit of all the States. They claimed this to be a constitutional right; claimed that the Constitution had provided for its own overthrow and destruction. That was an extreme and most erroneous doctrine, but not more so than the doctrine for which the friends of this measure are now contending. What is the difference? The secessionists claimed that part of the States had the constitutional power and right by secession to dissolve the Union and break up the Government; while you claim that part of the States (three fourths) have the constitutional power, by amendment, to overthrow the present Government and establish a monarchy. Both are extreme doctrines, and equally unsound and false.

Mr. Speaker, the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] on this question was sound and unanswerable; it has not yet been refuted, nor can it be. Whoever attempts to meet it will find himself involved in the defense of a doctrine as extreme and baseless as secession. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. COX], in his speech in reply to his colleague, [Mr. PENDLETON], in contending for this unlimited power of amendment, ran into this extreme doctrine, which is just as groundless as secession. Now, I care not what may be the popular feeling on this question. I would rather be right—rather hold on to the Constitution as the only hope of union, the only ark of safety—and stand alone, than have all the people of the North and of the South with me and be wrong. True loyalty seldom needs much argument to restrain it from violating the Constitution. But there are influences urging on this change in the Constitution that no argument can meet—that can not be reasoned away. The very proposition to make this radical change manifests a deep dissatisfaction on the part of the North as well as the South with that "old bond of union."

Years since it was proclaimed by Wendell Phillips, the apostle of abolitionism, that the Constitution of our fathers was "a league with death and a covenant with hell." How many there are now who are ready to go with him and lay the hand of revolution upon that instrument to destroy it! You are not satisfied with "the Constitution as it is," and you do not want the Union restored as it was. While it is said that the rebels are determined to make "slavery the corner-stone" of a new government in the South, it is equally true that you are resolved to make abolition the corner-stone of a new government in the North. The people of the North are to-day as much dissatisfied with the Constitution as are the people of the South. The doctrine of Wendell Phillips has become popular, and there is very little true loyalty in the North now.

Sir, it was a terrible day for the South when secession triumphed; and now it is a dark and fearful day in the North, when another revolution for the overthrow of the Constitution is about to be consummated.

Mr. Speaker, the emancipation proclamation was professedly issued as a military measure to suppress the rebellion. The hypocrisy of that profession is seen in the treatment Kentucky has received. There is not a State that has exhibited more true loyalty and devotion to the Union, or made greater sacrifices for its preservation. A State that has poured out her best blood on every battle-field; a State that has known more of the perils and suffered more from the ravages and desolation of war than all the northern States; a State to which the most solemn pledges were again and again made by the President, and by every department of the Government, that her local institutions were beyond the power of the Federal Government and should be held sacred, is, nevertheless, now to be treated as a rebel State. Gentlemen whose States have no interest in this measure sit calmly here, and, in defiance of the constitution and laws of Kentucky, propose to strike down and destroy a large portion of the property and wealth of that State. Not one of the pledges made to Kentucky has been regarded; they have all been violated; she has been treated in bad faith; she has been deceived and betrayed. And now you propose to convulse all our industrial pursuits by the sudden emancipation of the entire slave population of the State—a shock that no community can bear, and one that must prove ruinous to the best interests of the slaves themselves.

Sir, what has been the fruit of your emancipation policy in this city? Only a day or two since my attention was called to a publication, signed by the Chaplain of this House and others, giving a most melancholy account of the free negroes in this city; stating that of the families of blacks which had been visited,

“One half are without fuel or the means to obtain it. Women who go out to service put their little ones in bed, or cover them in rags on the floor, and go in search of five or ten cents' worth of work, to buy a stick of wood and a loaf of bread. Failing to find employment, if the ground is not frozen, they pull rags from the gutter, wash them at night, and then sell them to get a little fire and food. Children who are old enough assist in this means of obtaining a living; and even gather bones from the alleys to sell, after carrying them in storm and mud for a long distance.”

Now, sir, before the emancipation act was passed, I do not believe there could have been found in this city a single slave suffering for food, fuel, or shelter; but now we find that of nine hundred families of free negroes one half of them are at this moment starving and perishing for food and shelter. There, sir, is the first fruits of your policy.

And now, after the laboring male slaves have nearly all been withdrawn from Kentucky and gathered into the Army, suddenly to emancipate the remainder of the slave population, consisting principally of women and children, and throw them penniless upon the world; what but starvation and death will await them? Sir, if your policy shall be carried out, it will result in the extermination of that unfortunate race. But this is a question that I feel but little disposed now to argue; because if Washington himself were here he could not be heard; or if Paul, who returned a fugitive slave to his master, were here, and should again proclaim and command, “Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh, not with eye-service as men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart,” he would not be heard. No, no, these latter-day saints are too holy for that. They would never fraternize with Washington nor listen to the voice of Paul.

But, sir, when this storm of fanaticism shall have exhausted itself and passed away it will then be seen that the slaveholders in the slave States were the only true friends of the slave, while the abolitionists were his worst and most cruel enemy. Most of these gentlemen from the North know but little about the slave, and really care nothing for him. Their high-sounding professions of sympathy for the slave is the mere stock in trade which they carry into the political market. The truth is that most of them have no more real sympathy for the negro than Satan has for a sinner. They must see now, and know, that their policy has already brought suffering, disease, starvation, and death to thousands of that race; yet, in full view of all this, and in defiance of constitutions and laws, we must be hurried on to the immediate emancipation of all the slaves in Kentucky. Sir, I protest against it. I would rather be one of the few men who stand firm against such fanaticism; I would rather have the honor (for it will be an honor at some day) of having stood by, and defended to the last, the Constitution as made by Washington and the fathers, than to have all the ephemeral applause that may be bestowed upon new converts to the cause of abolition. As for such applause, I trample it beneath my feet; I scorn it; I spit upon it; infinitely preferring the proud consciousness of having been true to principle, true to the Constitution, and true to the Government bequeathed to us by our fathers, and purchased for us with their blood.

Mr. Speaker, men of true loyalty, who ardently desired and hoped to see the old Union restored, begin now to despair. There is a powerful party in the South opposing it with arms in their hands; there is also a strong party here in the North opposed to it. They are resolved to make radical and fundamental changes in the Constitution. It has been said that certain peace negotiators have been electioneering with members in this Hall in favor of the proposed amendment, on the ground that it will have a happy effect on Jefferson Davis in bringing him to terms. Why, sir, the whole policy of this Administration on the negro question has been exactly what Davis and his cabinet would have advised if they had been consulted; and this amendment, if passed, will be another firebrand thrown into the South. Davis would like to see it passed, because it will still more exasperate and band together the people of the South in a determined and desperate struggle for life or death.

Sir, the rebellion would long since have been subdued but for the continued attempt to conquer it by sectionalism. It was nothing but this that first made the breach between the North and South, and brought on all our troubles; and yet the party in power resort to sectionalism, and nothing but sectionalism, as the only remedy. They insist that the whole South must be abolished and forced to adopt the local policy of the North. Sir, a madman would succeed just as well in attempting to extinguish a flame by continually throwing on fuel. Yet such has been, and no doubt will still be, the policy of that party, and there is great reason to fear that the Union will never be restored.

Mr. Speaker, I will not repeat the argument. But I deny that there is any constitutional power to force any domestic institution or local policy upon any State. I deny that you have any more constitutional power, to abolish slavery in Kentucky and change her domestic institutions, than you have to establish a monarchy there. If you pass such an amendment as this, you do it by the arbitrary and wanton exercise of power, stripped of all constitutional justification, and palpably unjust and oppressive. Sir, we are surrounded by fearful and threatening perils on every hand; the times are alarming, and there is danger that the Constitution, after all that has been done and suffered to preserve it, may at last sink and perish by the hand of revolution in the North.

POLICY OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

SPEECH OF HON. ALEX. LONG, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 7, 1865.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. LONG said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I ask the indulgence of the committee for the purpose of submitting a few remarks upon the present deplorable and unhappy condition of the country and the madness and fanaticism that rules the hour; but, as I said on a former occasion I repeat now, I speak for myself, and for what I may say and the opinions I entertain I alone am responsible, as well to the country as to the intelligent constituency who honored me with a seat in this assembly; and while entertaining views diametrically opposed to the adherents of the Administration, and at variance with the opinions of some of my political friends upon this floor, I trust that I shall be able to express myself without violating any of the rules of debate, or infringing upon either the courtesy of the House or the dignity of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, there are many who tell us that the policy of war and subjugation has been settled by the result of the presidential election. They insist that it is now a finality, and that it is the imperative duty of all good citizens to carry the point of acquiescence in the popular verdict into future support and approval of the Administration. I do not so regard it. Under a republican form of government there ought to be no finalities of this character. It is as much an obligation upon any citizen or member of a republican community to tender to those in authority his advice, if he regards it as valuable and essential, after an election as before. It is not to be supposed that the apparent majority of the people, by their votes in favor of Mr. Lincoln, intended absolutely to instruct him to pursue his policy without regard to change of circumstances. To suppose so would be to argue a want of discretion and a folly unworthy of intelligent men. The ears of Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet should always be open to receive suggestions touching their political action from any of their constituents. Those of us who honestly and sincerely believe the war is wrong, wrong in principle and can by no possibility achieve any valuable result, but that on the contrary its continuance will impoverish and ruin the country, both North and South, are in duty bound to express such views when the subject is presented for consideration. Truth is powerful and mighty, and our opponents of the majority, and their representatives in the Administration, may change their views and adopt a different policy at any time; so may the majority of the people at home. Mr. Lincoln himself, as I have been informed, in July, 1861, in a conversation with gentlemen from Kentucky, some of whom are upon this floor, said “that if a majority of the people of the South were not really for the Union, and were not restrained from the expression of loyal sentiments by military violence, then this war was more than a blunder; it was a gigantic crime.” It is fair to assume that if the President can become satisfied upon this point, of which I have not the slightest doubt, he will act upon such conviction; at any rate, neither he nor his friends have any cause of complaint against those who adopt his conclusions upon testimony satisfactory to them. It would be disrespectful to the Chief Magistrate to assume that he was not sincere or truthful in his statement as to the course of conduct that would govern him in a given contingency. Even in ordinary questions of party difference the result of no election is considered finally decisive of the issue, or to be of such a character as to cause the minority to give up the struggle. Especially, Mr. Chairman, is it the duty of the Representatives of the people upon this floor fearlessly to express their opinions, under all circumstances.

Sir, cast your eye over the examples of history, and you will find uniformly that wars for independence and separation of geographical parts are successful upon the side of the separationists. When the affections of large masses of the people in such geographical divisions become alienated from each other, and such alienation is succeeded by feelings of relentless hostility, it has always been found impossible to hold them in common bonds. Look at the separation of Portugal from Spain, of Holland from Spain, subsequently of Holland from Belgium, of the United States from England, of Mexico from Spain, South America from Spain, St. Domingo from France, of Texas from Mexico, Greece from Turkey, and numerous other instances; in every one of which the cry for separation upon one side was answered by armed coercion and subjugation on the other. In all of them the odds as to wealth, power, and numbers were as great in favor of the coercion party as they are in the present instance. Yet in each case, I repeat, the coercing policy failed, ending only in ignominy and defeat, as it must ever do under the providence of God, because it is in derogation of His laws.

Some fastidious and excessively loyal gentlemen may be offended by these historical illustrations, and consider them unpatriotic, if not treasonable. But are they not true? And does patriotism and loyalty demand that historical truths be suppressed? If they do, then am I unpatriotic and disloyal also. My theory is that if any cause cannot survive the truth it ought to perish. I know it will perish.

A word or two in this connection upon this subject of patriotism. What can be more ungenerous than this claim to superior patriotism upon the part of those who favor the policy of war and subjugation over those of us who are opposed to it? How offensive to truth and justice. It is a compound of presumption, impertinence, and egotism, that cannot be too firmly rebuked and indignantly repelled. It is remarkable how it can come from the lips of any man who has the spirit of a gentleman, whose sensibilities are always alive to the rights and opinions of others, however widely they may differ with him. Mr. Chairman, I impugn the patriotism of no man simply because he believes in the wisdom and justice of the war, and I regard it as an unjust aspersion of my character, as an independent Representative upon this floor, bound at all times to speak the truth as I understand it, to have my fidelity and patriotism called in question because I regard the war in a different light from others. Such charges awaken in me no emotion save that of pity and contempt for the gentlemen who make them; they betray a want of that elevated statesmanship which rises above the mere partisan and from a patriotic stand-point calmly and impartially surveys the honest opinions of men, and gathers therefrom the duties of the crisis. We who have opposed this war have given the highest possible proof of our love of country. We have given marked proof of our honesty, sincerity, and disinterestedness. There have been no profitable contracts to give to gentlemen of our school; there have been no rich and lucrative offices in that direction; it has not been the road to wealth and patronage; without power, without patronage, no place to offer, no office to bestow, nothing with which to tempt or beguile, dazzle or allure, we have stood firmly upon our honest convictions of duty in striving to promote the welfare of our country, and preserve the republican form of government bequeathed us by our fathers. It is a fact that has not escaped my observation, that by a singular coincidence many of those who have vaunted so loudly their patriotism have been made immensely wealthy through its instrumentality. Of course I cast no imputations upon disinterestedness of motive, although the fact is one that to those inclined to be censorious might suggest many reflections. Patriotism has been a paying virtue thus far under the war and subjugation policy; it is seldom that a virtue has been so easily coined into gold. For us, on the other hand, there has been proscription and persecution; for us have been the Bastille and the mob; upon us have rested the darkest frowns of power, and the heaviest maledictions and curses. Apostasy on the one hand tendered a golden reward, on the other frowned the dangers of a prison. Men who thus display their highest moral heroism are not very likely to be unpatriotic, or to be guilty of treason. The virtues, like the graces, generally go hand in hand. It is a proud subject for congratulation that, despite all terrifically adverse influences, the number of those who denounced this war has been steadily and rapidly increased. From a few hundred who dared to express themselves in opposition to it in 1861, they are become hundreds of thousands in 1865, and the progress of events is daily adding to their numbers.

But to return from this digression. No superstructure resting upon falsehood and error can endure. Wars for geographical unity end in disintegration. Wars for religious uniformity end in further religious divisions. Although the odds may apparently be in favor of the coercion party, yet they really, on account of the physical and moral difficulties of the undertaking, are with the separationists. Our Army has done all that brave men could do. No soldiers have ever fought better. They have, in the main, been ably commanded; but brave as they are, and able as have been their commanders, they cannot overcome impossibilities. The extermination of the southern people is an impossibility. The failure of success proceeds from the fact that eight or ten million people, fighting upon their own soil, are fully a match for eighteen million whose armies have to be transported vast distances and at frightful expense to the scene of action. Time and space fight upon the side of the assailed, and well make up for the difference in numbers.

So much for the mere physical differences that attend the war upon our part. It has been waged for four years upon a scale the magnitude of which has astonished the world. Armies so immense were never before brought into the field by any civilized country of three times our population. The experiment of war has been fully tried, and has resulted in widening the breach it was intended to heal, and it has well been denominated in the Chicago platform "a failure." It is useless for gentlemen to deny this; they may point to the territory that has been apparently won and the victories that we have gained, but what results have followed? The victories have been barren and unproductive of good; and the territory won is really nothing but the ground our brave soldiers stand upon, and which is commanded by their guns. The wave of the hostile population divided by the invading army closes up immediately behind it, and the feelings of the people are more intensely bitter against us, and they are more thoroughly united for separation from us than they were when the war commenced. None of the consequences have followed the capture of Vicksburg, Atlanta, Savannah, and other points, that were anticipated by the advocates of the present policy, and it is equally certain that a similar disappointment would follow the capture of Richmond, Charleston, and other strongholds yet in their possession.

The war is ostensibly waged to preserve intact our political institutions; it is in fact destroying them. Instead of being calculated to prevent future changes and revolutions, it is really begetting them. Those who desire to preserve existing conditions of society and to be spared future revolutions should use their influence to bring the war to a speedy termination. It is unsettling everything. It is engendering discord and bitterness where before there was concord and harmony. It is developing opposition of interests where before there was supposed to be uniformity. It is creating sectional interests, differences, and animosities, in addition to those heretofore existing. It is multiplying the genus of a terrible social change and revolution. The most radical, revolutionary, and disorganizing doctrines have been brought into vogue by the war; doctrines which sweep away the whole fabric of our institutions. We are in fact vibrating between anarchy and despotism. Some of the questions already growing out of the war will be impossible to settle, and may produce evils scarcely inferior to the war itself. The most hateful elements of discord and strife have now fairly entered the American body-politic, and he would be a wonderful magician indeed who could cause them to be exorcised. How absurd the idea that if we acquiesce in the separation of the South other sections will immediately and necessarily follow its example. To affirm that other States will secede, unless forcibly prevented, is to confess that there are fatal defects in the Union somewhere, and that it will naturally tumble to pieces unless prevented by forcible measures.

The argument of our opponents proves too much. Is it really true that all the component parts of our Confederacy are held together solely by force, and that all are anxious to escape from a galling chain? Are they willing to admit this? Is this the best Government upon earth which we have all been taught to admire and venerate? Ought a confederacy of States to exist, if all or a large majority of its members are desirous, as our opponents seem to think, of separation?

The truth is, there is no necessary connection between the secession of the South and subsequent secession, should the war terminate now; but the time will come in its future prosecution, should it be persisted in, when such point may be reached. Men do not capriciously change and break up governmental relations. The Declaration of Independence well says:

"All experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed."

Peace and separation will not produce future secession, but the war and its prosecution in all probability will. The welfare of the individual being the primary end of all republican government, and our Government being but an agent of the States, created by the States, and clothed by them with delegated powers, limited and well defined, it must be apparent that when a State desires to secede from the Union thus formed it does so under the belief that it will be better off out of than in the Union. The original incentive to union is in the idea or belief that union is preferable to isolation; that a State will be better in than out of the Union. It follows, therefore, that if union is preferable to isolation, there will always be union of some kind. If, on the other hand, isolation is preferable to union, then the natural status of the State is isolation, and union cannot be compelled by coercion.

The experiment now being tried at so fearful a sacrifice of blood and treasure will in the end demonstrate to the world that confederacies cannot be held together by the mad policy of coercion. Governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, and existing only in the hearts and affections of the people, cannot be held together by force, but they may be preserved by a spirit of compromise and mutual concession, which gentlemen on the other side of the House never were willing to exhibit, even to save the Union that they profess now to regard as so precious. I repeat that many of the adherents of the Administration considered their prejudices and their abstract and pernicious theories far more important than the Union. I am somewhat doubtful of the sincerity of their devotion to the Union now, when I remember how easily they could have saved it by a slight modification of their views, and how stubbornly they refused it. Men who cannot conquer and make some surrender of abstract prejudices for the general good are not likely to give the last dollar in defense of the Union, and undoubtedly prefer to be the last man themselves.

Mr. Chairman, since I last had the honor of addressing this House, what we used to call a presidential election has taken place. I say what we used to call, for the late meetings of the people at the polls and the preceding canvass bear but little resemblance to the old idea of a popular election. The press opposed to the Administration, it may be said, were at liberty to denounce its policy, but before them was presented a frightful picture of over two hundred papers that had been suppressed or ruined by too free criticism. Our public speakers were at liberty to harangue their fellow-citizens upon the stump, but the fact was suggested to them that several hundred gentlemen who had engaged in that business found that it led straight to a military camp or prison. It was not prohibited to any of our brave officers distributing Democratic tickets to the voters in their command, except that those inclined to do it remembered the fate of the New Hampshire officer whose name was ignominiously stricken from the roll for that cause. The soldiers, if furnished with Democratic tickets, might vote against the Administration; but then if they did there was the extra duty and the guard-house. The brave soldiers in the field might have been instructed in Democratic truths had not most of Mr. Lincoln's lieutenants in military command taken upon themselves the duty of carefully interdicting, directly or indirectly, the circulation of such doctrines in any form in the Army. In many of the States—no, I beg pardon for using the term, they are military departments—our generals very kindly made the arrangements to take charge of the election, and, if not actually present at the polls, were just behind the scenes and within easy call. States that were regarded close and doubtful were carried by the simple expedient of sending a few thousand soldiers home to vote, and retaining in the front those who were inclined to vote the other way. This, of course, rendered the election perfectly free. Indeed, from what I have learned from our Indiana friends on this side of the House, nothing could be more free than the voting in that State; there was not the least objection to soldiers from other States voting there, and voting fifteen or twenty times, provided always that they voted the Administration ticket. It was as free as some gentlemen would have the debates upon this floor; perfectly free, provided you speak on the side of the Administration and in favor of the war, but expulsion or censure if you presume to speak against either.

In Kentucky our friends were allowed to vote, under peculiar circumstances; they were told by the Administration organs that the poll-books would be carefully consulted by those who issued permits of trade, to find out who were loyal and entitled to permits, and who were disloyal and not entitled to any, and as in that State, by the mode of voting, the poll-books show the name of each elector voting, and opposite the name of the candidate for whom he voted, the vote itself was to determine the question of loyalty or disloyalty. The result was that many were disloyal, and but few entitled to permits of trade. But I do not care to dwell upon this terrible and calamitous farce upon all our ideas of a republican Government. The recollections of it are very humiliating, as well as saddening, and mark the decadence of the old spirit of our countrymen. Yet in the very face of all the outrages that have been committed upon the freedom of election, the Administration organ, the Morning Chronicle of this city, in its Sunday morning issue of December 11, exultingly and boastfully says:

"But this election demonstrates that our people can stand the fiery ordeal of war, even in its most dangerous shape—that of insurrection—without impeding the form of our government or the faith of our people. This political canvass gives a memorable pledge of the security of free speech, a free press, and a free ballot."

From previous developments, I for one expected what actually occurred. I had taken an accurate measurement of the means that those in power were willing to employ in its perpetuation. I foresaw the result from the beginning, and was not disappointed. The issue made up was not what the great mass of the people expected. It was not what they had a right to expect. The war for the coercion and subjugation of sovereign States is either right or it is wrong, constitutional or unconstitutional. Peace or war was the issue demanded and expected by the people. Many like myself could take no part in a contest between candidates both of whom were committed to the prosecution of the war, and differing only in "the resources of statesmanship" they proposed to exhaust before the final subjugation or extermination of the southern people. I hope the House will pardon me for calling attention to what I said upon such an issue on this floor last April. I then said:

"I take little or no interest in the discussion of the question which many of my political friends would make an issue, as to how this war shall be prosecuted, its manner, and object. I regard that as worse than trifling with the great question. I do not believe there can be any prosecution of the war against a sovereign State under the Constitution, and I do not believe that a war so carried on can be prosecuted so as to render it proper, justifiable or expedient." * * * "I will say further, that if it is to be still further prosecuted, I for one prefer that it shall be done under the auspices of those who now conduct its management, as I do not wish the party with which I am connected to be in any degree responsible for its results, which cannot be otherwise than disastrous and suicidal."

And now, Mr. Chairman, with all due respect for the opinions of my political friends who differ with me, and the friends of the Administration on the other side of the House, I have yet to hear the argument that will change my judgment upon that subject; and I now add, that as I stood upon this floor last April, so I stand to-day, singly and alone, if it be so, strengthened only by the lapse of time and the occurrence of subsequent events in the correctness of my convictions and what I then said, on all questions in relation to the war. There never has been, and never can be, a Union founded on the coercion and subjugation of sovereign States. The very blood of our forefathers, shed in defense of the rights of individuals and the independence and sovereignty of States, would rise up in judgment against it. By our action of to-day we tacitly confess that the signers of the Declaration of Independence uttered a falsehood, and that those who bled for this independence were mistaken zealots; for we now seek to define the independence thus achieved to be the unconditional submission of a portion of these sovereign and independent States to the coercive power of others, through their common agent, the Federal Government. War never has and never can give union. War is disunion. A union implies distinct and separate parts, for if there were no parts there could be no union. One State is not a union, for it is an integral whole in itself; yet it is a part of the Union, and it is equally so of each State; each one being an integral whole or part of the Union. These parts consented to unite, and this consent or agreement constitutes the bond of union or form under which we have lived. The Union was thus formed by consent, it existed by consent, and it could not, in the very nature of things, exist one moment longer than the consent existed. A thing cannot exist after the essence by which it lives is gone. A war, therefore, to compel union among the States, is to blot out and extinguish forever the very essence by which alone it could exist. If the right of self-government resides in the people, as gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House, with a few exceptions, have so earnestly contended for, in the discussion of the constitutional amendment, then it is an attribute of sovereignty, and entitles them at pleasure to change any form of government they may have instituted for the government of themselves. To affirm that the States, separately or united under a Confederation, had a right to throw off the external government imposed upon them by Great Britain, but have no right to interfere with one established by themselves, is to make their last condition worse than the first.

Mr. Chairman, what will the future historian, in calmer moments, say of the sacrifice of blood and treasure expended by the American people, to compel union among each other? May he not exonerate the people of the seceded States from the charge of rebellion and treason by saying that they have understood the Federal compact in the light in which the founders of the Republic understood it, and that they, in fact, withdrew from the union with us in order to preserve for themselves that form of government which their and our forefathers established? I have heard from day to day upon this floor, during the discussion upon the proposed constitutional amendment, the doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty denounced as a pestilential and most dangerous heresy, and indeed one of my colleagues, [Mr. GARFIELD,] if I understand the import of his language, went so far as to deny that any one of the colonies, as a colony, or any of the States, after they became States, ever was, in fact, free and independent. That it was the united people of the colonies—the people of the thirteen colonies in the aggregate—who declared their independence, and yet he affirms that sovereignty was never lodged in the people; that it passed from the Crown of Great Britain into the revolutionary Congress, next into the Articles of Confederation, and lastly into the Constitution of the United States, where it now resides. But that I may do no injustice to my colleague, I will quote his own language, which is as follows:

"I. That prior to the 4th day of July, 1776, these colonies were neither free nor independent. Their sovereignty was lodged in the Crown of Great Britain.

"II. I affirm that no colony declared itself free and independent. Neither Virginia, New York, nor Massachusetts, declared itself free and independent of the Crown of Great Britain. The declaration was made, not even by the whole of the colonies, as colonies, but the declaration was made in the name of 'the good people of the colonies' as a people.

"III. The sovereignty of this people, then, was first lodged in the revolutionary Congress, and it continued there until the 1st day of March, 1781, when they lodged it in the Articles of Confederation."

"IV. On the 21st day of June, 1788, a new judgment of this sovereignty of the American people was made. It was then lodged in this Constitution of the United States under which we now are—lodged there by the action of the people."

He then adds:

"If the gentleman looks, then, for a kind of political apostolic succession of American sovereignty, he will find it in this order, and this would be the genealogy: first, in the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain; second, the revolutionary Congress; third, the Articles of Confederation; and fourth, and now, in the Constitution of the United States."

Such, then, is the idea of the sovereignty of the people of these States as held by my colleague, and, so far as appears, also by the adherents of the Administration upon this floor; for no one, I believe, has yet dissented from his position. In order to strike down the sovereignty of the States, the only security left to personal liberty, and the last hope of preserving free government, it has become necessary to deny that the people of this country are or ever were sovereign; that sovereignty never had a lodgment in either the people, the colonies, or the States; but that it always was lodged, from the British Crown to the Constitution, in a higher power than the people, notwithstanding the inalienable rights, enumerated in the Declaration of Independence.

Let us, then, meet this question fairly and honestly, and for ourselves decide if such was the intention and understanding of the founders of the Republic; let us decide for ourselves whether this war, waged against States which are either in or out of the Union, is a war of selfishness or of honor and justice; for, shrink from it as we may, the time will come when our own children will sit in judgment upon the acts of their fathers.

Before the Revolution, Great Britain had thirteen colonies in North America, existing under separate charters or royal grants, and having each its own governor, legislative assembly, and court of justice. These colonies were as wholly separate from each other as though they were different and distinct nations, and so little did they harmonize with each other that only four years before the revolutionary war commenced, Dr. Franklin declared "that only the hand of God could unite them."

On the 4th day of July, 1776, these colonies, through their delegates in the Colonial Congress, declared themselves independent of Great Britain: "These colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." Did this transfer their sovereignty from the Crown to the Congress? Did it consolidate them into one people? My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] says it did. If so, why were Articles of Confederation drafted in 1777, assented to by eleven of the States in 1778, but not finally acted upon by all until 1781? If the people were one people, or the States were consolidated, why did they confederate together? A confederation means a league of sovereign States or nations, nothing more. They must be sovereign, otherwise they cannot consent. The right to do so is derived from their sovereignty. The fractional parts of a nation cannot enter into obligations with other nations. This compact was made, as any other treaty would have been made, by the State governments, not by the States themselves. When the Articles of Confederation were drafted, they were called Articles of Confederation, which, or an equivalent term, would not have been proper had the several States intended to merge their individual existence into one nationality; and they were, in fact, as in name, Articles of Confederation, entered into by the several States with each other to secure those objects alone for which confederacies are ordinarily formed, to wit: State or national security against the force or violence of foreign nations, and to prevent discord among themselves respectively.

In these Articles not a solitary provision can be found for the protection of individual rights, or those which belong to the citizen. The five great objects of government, the protection of life, liberty, person, property, and reputation, are wholly omitted—a strange omission, indeed, if the object had been to consolidate the people of the thirteen States into one nation, but perfectly explicable upon the hypothesis that they were designed merely to protect the State against external violence, while security to individual rights was left to be provided for as the wisdom of the sovereign people of each State should think best, acting through their own several and separate State governments. During the eleven years that the States acted under these Articles of Confederation they acted as separate States, the power being wielded by a congress of State delegates, who acted together, and voted one vote for each State. But that the Articles of 1778 created a league or confederation of sovereign States or nations, and nothing more, is proved beyond the possibility of rational contradiction; first, in the fact that by the provisional articles, or treaty of peace between Great Britain and the States, signed at Paris on the 30th of November, 1782, (see Hansard's Parliamentary History, volume 25, page 354,) the former Government recognized them each, by name, as separate and independent States, as follows:

"ART. 1. His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, viz: New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign, and independent States; that he treats with them as such; and for himself, his heirs, and successors, relinquishes all claim to the government, property, and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof."

It must be borne in mind that this act of Great Britain, by which she recognizes the freedom, sovereignty, and independence, separate and by name, of these States, took place five years after the Articles of Confederation were drafted, and while they were in full force and effect. Second, the Constitution of the United States, in article seven, and the last article of the original Constitution, provides that—

"The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

This provision contains within itself perfectly unanswerable and conclusive evidence that the separate sovereignty of each State was fully recognized by the convention which framed the Constitution, as well as by all the States who were parties to it. The Constitution must be ratified by a convention of the States (not of the whole people of the thirteen States) in order to become operative within the limits of such States, and if nine of them shall thus ratify it, it shall go into operation as to the nine, while the remaining four, being unaffected by it, stand before the world as separate and independent nations.

I have no hesitation in declaring that if these States had not been separate sovereignties during the existence of the old Confederation, that the article above recited would, in itself, have been sufficient to render them such, for it contains as formal a recognition of the fact as could well be made. But by reference to the proceedings of the Convention that framed the Constitution we have still stronger and more conclusive testimony as to the fact of their separate sovereignty. In the original draft of the Constitution, as reported by John Rutledge, (see the Madison Papers, page 1226,) article twenty-one was as follows:

"The ratification of the conventions of — States shall be sufficient for organizing this Constitution."

On the 31st of August, the ratification of the Constitution being under consideration—

"Rufus King moved to add to the end of article twenty-one the words, 'between the said States,' so as to confine the operation of the Government to the States ratifying it."

"On the question, nine States voted in the affirmative; Maryland 'no'; Delaware absent."

The blank was subsequently filled (see page 1473) by inserting "nine."

Here, then, is a direct invitation to the States to secede from the old Articles of Confederation, which had been declared to be "Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union," entered into by all the States, and ratified by all the State Legislatures. It was admitted by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in answer to a question by my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] in the discussion on the constitutional amendment, that if any four of the States had refused to ratify the Constitution they would have been independent States. What then becomes of the consolidated Government of my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD?] Where does he lodge sovereignty in such a contingency? Any four of the States could have remained out for all time, and no one has yet, I believe, gone so far in the effort to break down State sovereignty as to claim for the nine States ratifying the Constitution a superiority or control over the four that might have refused. So well did the framers of the Constitution understand this, that—

"Gouverneur Morris thought the blank ought to be filled in a twofold way, so as to provide for the event of the ratifying States being contiguous, which would render a smaller number sufficient, and the event of their being dispersed, which would require a greater number for the introduction of the Government." (See page 1469.)

An intimation from some of the States to others, to take steps for secession from the Confederation, led to the assembling of the Convention of Delegates at Philadelphia, on the 25th of May, 1787, who were to draft amendments to the old Articles of Confederation; but on assembling they found that at least two plans for a new constitution had already been prepared, one of which was by Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, and the other by William Patterson, of New Jersey, and these plans were the basis of the present Constitution. Now, although it was called a constitutional convention, which was to propose amendments to the Articles of Confederation, but decided on a complete new Constitution, and did agree to one, it had no intrinsic power to impose its work on the States which were represented, nor on any of them. It was only a drafting convention, which could draw up and recommend such a compact as the separate States might accept or reject. It was to be a convention in its very organization showing its subordinate character. It was called, not by the people, but by the States as States, and by each State acting for herself, but acting with the others. They were called as States on the roll. They sat together as States when in session. They voted as States on all questions, each State casting one vote. They styled themselves deputies of States, and when they had framed the Constitution, they sent it to the Confederate Congress by their President, General Washington, who signed it, "George Washington, President of the Convention and deputy of Virginia."

Congress recommended that the Constitution should be submitted for ratification to the several States, acting by separate conventions. The respective Legislatures passed laws providing for the conventions. The States, each by her convention, ratified for herself, and it was separately adopted by nine States, the number necessary to give it force, make it binding "between the said States," not over the people, and not between the remaining States until they ratified it. Maryland and Rhode Island remained out of the Union of States for nearly two years, during which time they were treated as friendly foreign States. Where was the sovereignty of Maryland and Rhode Island then? Where does my colleague lodge it? Every part of the Constitution attests its Federal, and not national character.

Up to the 20th of June, 1787, during the session of the Convention, the word "nation" was used repeatedly in the original draft, without apparently any reflection; but Alexander Hamilton, who had remained silent until the 18th and 19th of June, then declared his hostility to "State sovereignty." "Mr. Martin said he considered that the separation from Great Britain placed the thirteen States in a state of nature toward each other," and thereupon, on motion of Mr. Gorham, of Massachusetts, the word "national" was stricken out of the Constitution. (See page 909.) The Declaration of Independence had settled the principle for each of the States which it brought into existence, that sovereignty resides in the people of a State or nation, and that Governments are mere agents, intrusted with powers which may be resumed at the will or pleasure of the sovereign. It follows, then, that the Federal Government did not and could not have acquired sovereignty through the Constitution.

The only question, then, which remains to be considered is, whether the people of each State surrendered their separate existence by the adoption of the Constitution, and thereby became a nation. I see no reason to doubt that two or more nations might thus, by agreement, consolidate themselves into one nation. But certainly when an act of such vast magnitude as the surrender of the sovereignty of a people is claimed to have been made, it should be established by the highest evidence which it is possible to present to the human mind. In the Constitution of the United States, and in the amendments thereto, not a line, not a sentence, not a word can be found indicating that such was the intention of the several States who are parties to that instrument. They did not intend to consolidate the States into one nation; but what they did intend, and which was effected by the Federal Constitution, was the establishment of a confederacy, or league of sovereign States, with power in the confederacy to effect the object or purpose for which it was formed. That these were the objects, and the only objects, of those who framed the Constitution is evidenced from the fact that all of the powers of the Government of the United States have relation to nations and not to individuals. From the foundation of the Government until the commencement of the present war no law was ever passed by the United States Government having for its object the protection of the life, liberty, person, property, and reputation of a single individual, and yet these are the great and indeed the only objects of a Government proper. True, we have a law punishing offenses upon the high seas, murders, piracies, &c.; a law against conspiracies formed for the purpose of committing certain crimes upon the navigable rivers of the United States, and laws for the protection of post offices, &c., as well as laws for the extradition of fugitive criminals and slaves; but these are all designed to secure harmony among nations, both those confederated together and those abroad.

Mr. Lincoln once said that a State bears the same relation to the Federal Government which a county does to a State, and yet Mr. Lincoln had just left the State of Illinois, whose government had protected him during the greater part of his life, and secured to him the enjoyment of life, liberty, property, person, and reputation, which the United States does not and could not have done. If the framers had intended to consolidate, they would not have required the assent of three fourths of the States to make amendments to the Constitution. If the people of the States became consolidated by that instrument to any intent, or for any purpose, why did not the Convention authorize amendments by three fourths, or any given number, of the whole people? The assent can only be given by the States, separately and as distinct peoples. If they were one people, or if it had been designed that they should be one people in their relation to the Federal Government, surely they would have been required to amend the instrument which made them one by a united vote. Article eleven of the amendments to the Constitution provides that—

"The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

Here is language so luminous as to pierce the darkest understanding. The sovereignty of the State is as fully recognized in this article as it is possible to recognize it. Not only is the State fully recognized, but its dignity as a member of the family of nations is secured against assault.

1. It would have been the utmost violence to the whole design to have in the least attacked the ultimate right of sovereignty which the Declaration of Independence says is inalienable.

2. Because sovereignty, according to no scientific American writer, can exist only in the people, never in any Government.

3. The steps by which the Constitution was formed show that the States never meant suicide.

4. Two propositions were submitted to the Convention to clothe the Federal authority with power to coerce disobedient or refractory States, one of which was contained in the resolutions submitted by Edmund Randolph, and the other in the resolutions of Judge Patterson, and both of which were unanimously rejected by the Convention on the very ground of their hostility to State sovereignty.

5. In all the State conventions, as appears from Elliot's Debates, the friends of the Constitution insisted that State sovereignty was not affected by it, and this, too, in answer to the charges made against ratification.

6. It could not have been ratified by the requisite number of States if any such idea had obtained.

7. If the Government of the United States represents the consolidated people of the United States, not as united States, but as forming one imperial republic, then is allegiance due to the consolidated State; for it would then be sovereign, and not the States; and the sovereign has the only right to allegiance, because alone affording protection to the citizen. We all know this position to be false, ruinous, and absurd.

I am a citizen of Ohio, not a citizen of Maryland, Missouri, or any other State, and conventionally only, "a citizen of the United States," to which I owe no allegiance, because it is not my sovereign; nor can I divide my allegiance, even if I would; for sovereignty is an indivisible unit and cannot be cloven into parts. It is true that treason is a breach of allegiance, and that treason against the United States is punishable as a Federal offense, but that is only a conventional treason, a so-called treason, a State crime, arising from the terms of the special agreement made for it by the consent of each one of the States.

The first Kentucky resolution drafted by Thomas Jefferson in 1798, and for whose opinions gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have expressed so high an admiration recently, declares the true theory of the Federal compact:

1. "Resolved, That the several States composing the United States are not united on the principle of unlimited submission to their General Government, but that by a compact, under the style and title of a Constitution for the United States, and of amendments thereto, they constituted a General Government for special purposes; delegated to the Government certain definite powers, reserving, each State to itself, the residuary mass of right to their self-government; and that whenever the General Government assumes undelegated power, its acts are unauthorized, void, and of no force; that to this compact each State acceding as a State, and is an integral party, its co-States forming, as to itself, the other party; that the Government created by this compact was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the Constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among Powers having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the mode and measure of redress."

My conclusion, therefore, is that the people of each State constitute a sovereign State or nation, that each of these States or nations, by the adoption of the Federal Constitution created for itself, in common with its co-States, each acting for itself, a common agent upon which it conferred certain specified, limited, and well-defined powers; that the powers thus conferred did not impair or take away the sovereignty of the independent State or nation creating the agent; and that the powers thus conferred may be revoked by the people of any State themselves, so far as such State is concerned or affected thereby, whenever in the exercise of their sovereign will such revocation may become desirable.

Mr. BROOMALL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. BROOMALL. Does the gentleman believe that under the doctrine he has just declared here a State has the right to secede?

Mr. LONG. He does, Mr. Chairman. He believes that a State—one of the principals that created the common agent, the Federal Government—has the right, so far as such individual State is concerned, to revoke the warrant of attorney by which the agent was authorized to act for such State, and that the people of such State is the only tribunal on earth having the right to determine when it shall be done.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one other question: wherein his opinion on this subject differs from that of Mr. Jefferson Davis, and whether Mr. Jefferson Davis has been doing wrong in attempting to get States out of the Union?

Mr. LONG. Whether my opinion agrees with that of Jefferson Davis or not I know not and care not. Whether he is in common with the people of his State had any cause for withdrawing from the Union or not is a question unnecessary to be discussed at this time. It is enough to know that they have withdrawn, and my purpose is to convince others of that which to my own mind is clear, that they cannot be forced back into the Union by coercion.

The doctrines laid down as self-evident truths in the Declaration of Independence are, that all rightful government springs from the consent of the governed—that any people have the right to alter, change, or amend their form of government at pleasure. In the exercise of this right the colonies seceded from Great Britain, and each became a "free, sovereign, and independent State" or nation. In the exercise of this right the people of a large majority of the States have altered their constitutions, and some of them more than once, and the right has never been questioned.

Little did the States, the principals to the Federal compact, believe when they created their agent, with delegated and limited powers, that the time would ever come when that agent would contemptuously spurn all restraints upon its action, exercise powers entirely undelegated, and claim to rule despotically over those who had created it and bound it by solemn written and well-ascertained restrictions. A few wise men of that day did have some fears and apprehensions of this character, but it was generally believed that such amazing perfidy upon the part of the agent was impossible.

Mr. Chairman, I have already occupied a considerable portion of the time of the House, but I desire to submit a few additional remarks more immediately in connection with the war.

We have had recently a series of military successes. But brilliant achievements and the capture of cities and towns does not end the war and restore the confederate States to the Union. We may take Charleston, as we took Savannah; we may take Mobile, as we took New Orleans; we may take Richmond, as we took Vicksburg; we may even take all the southern strongholds, and yet it will not end the war. Their armies march into Pennsylvania, ours march through Georgia; we threaten Richmond, they threaten Washington; we burn the Military Institute at Lexington, they burn Chambersburg; we burn Governor Letcher's mansion, they burn Governor Bradford's; we sack Jackson, they sack Lawrence; they execute negro soldiers, we retaliate on white soldiers; and thus it goes on, and is but the beginning of a war of subjugation and extermination. The man does not live who will ever behold the end of it, if continued under the present policy. What have we gained thus far by it? What can we gain? We have loaded the nation down with sorrow and debt. Hundreds of thousands of our brave men have been slain, and yet it is true that we command less free-will support in the southern States to-day than we did when seventy-five thousand militia were to put down the rebellion in ninety days. Every month it has been continued for coercion and subjugation has only tended to cement, perpetuate, and traditionalize hatred of the North in every southern household.

Gentlemen may point to the achievement of our arms, the cities and towns we have captured, and the territory we have apparently conquered; but I ask, what have we gained by it all? It has not restored a State to the Union. We have simply, by the force of arms, neutralized temporarily, and thus given the appearance of subjugation to men who hate us and our policy. Even where our arms prevail perpetual war exists. The order which reigns in Norfolk, Nashville, Little Rock, Vicksburg, New Orleans, and Savannah is the order which reigned in Warsaw when the Russian chieftain proclaimed the subjugation of the Polish capital; and the peace we have gained in these localities is the peace of Poland and Hungary under Russian and Austrian power—a peace to be hated alike by subjugator and subjugated. The old year closed and the new year was ushered in by very considerable military disasters to the confederates, and victories to the Federal arms. The gore and blood-red light of success have transiently, and for the briefest interval, lit up the war horizon with a lurid glare, and tens if not hundreds of thousands have mistaken it as giving promise of the return of peace and repose through the subjugation and conquest of the seceded States. Though deceived and cheated for at least a score of times by similar vain delusions, they yet cling to them with that tenacity that is so often displayed by the prejudiced and ill-informed in favor of an idea which arouses their passions and appeals to their hopes. No past experience has thus far been of any avail upon this idea in the war mind, or capable of influencing it to a true sense of the condition in which we are placed. Demagogues are aware of it, and they play upon this weakness and infirmity with a recklessness that indicates their knowledge of the profound depths of ignorance in which it lies imbedded. In such times it is especially dangerous to go counter to the popular, cherished hope, to expose its fallacy and point out its mistakes, either in fact or in theory; and with many it is the very highest proof of "disloyalty," to use a cant phrase which the war party have borrowed from the meanest despotisms of the Old World.

Vain, then, are reason and argument; vain are all the lessons of the past, all the motives that ordinarily govern the men of the present, and all the probable contingencies of the future. Such can only be recommended to that stern school in which the fool learns, the school of hard and dear-bought experience. In that they will yet find that the rivers of blood which they are following lead to no ocean of union and harmony or repose and safety. Instead of running in that direction, the ensanguined current runs through mountains of debt, through low valleys of profligacy and crime, through public and individual calamity, and ends at last in the deepest slough of humiliation and regret.

The Anglo-Saxon race claims for itself the highest stand-point on the pinnacle of civilization and refinement, and the American type acknowledges no superior. How near do we come to the standard of perfection set up by ourselves? We are now in the midst of a sectional war, overshadowing in its enormities any civil or sectional war that has preceded it. The cry of our pulpits and churches, with a few highly creditable exceptions, instead of "peace on earth and good-will to man," has been for blood! Desolated homesteads and impoverished communities attest our capacity for self-destruction, and dispatches like the following from a general in the field to the President of the United States are received with joy and exaltation by those who claim to be the followers of the Prince of Peace:

"I have destroyed over two thousand barns filled with wheat and hay and farming implements, over seventy mills filled with flour and wheat; all the houses within an area of five miles were burned."

Such is the boasting of a Federal officer in the field; but while the war party rejoice at this indiscriminate conflagration of the homes and property of aged infirmity and helpless innocence, the cry of the widow and the fatherless ascend to God for that vengeance which sooner or later is visited on all iniquity.

Well may the despots of Europe hold us up as a warning to their unquiet subjects.

In a previous address which I had the honor to make upon this floor I expressed my belief that the only issue before us was either recognition of the separate independence of the seceded States or the complete extermination of the people who inhabit them—extermination in its broadest and completest sense. The issue is independence or extermination, and I am sorry to say that a very large portion of what presumptuously arrogates to itself the morality and religion of the country not only professes itself willing to favor extermination, but loudly and emphatically demands it. Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is with unutterable shame and humiliation that I confess it; they do demand the extermination of eight million Christian men and women; men and women who for three quarters of a century were united with them in the bonds of church fellowship, who knelt at the same altar, gathered around the same communion table, and worshipped the same God; men and women of the same race and lineage, speaking the same language, reared under the same institutions, and united to them by the strongest ties; whose ancestors, hand in hand with our ancestors, purchased our and their liberties with their common blood.

It is this race and this people that they now propose to exterminate from the face of the earth as if they were beasts of the field or reptiles of the plain. And for what, Mr. Chairman? I emphatically repeat, for what is this sentence of unequalled atrocity decreed? Simply because they have chosen to run a race of political existence separate and apart from us, leaving us all our rights and privileges, and only claiming the same rights which their and our ancestors asserted in the Declaration of Independence. For that a doom has been pronounced upon them which humanity recoiled from even in the case of the Mormons, and the still stronger example against the bloody and ferocious savages of the desert. Alas! how degenerate, is such Christianity—how unutterably cruel and venomous the spirit in which it is conceived! Standing here in my place, and with all the responsibility of my position, I should consider myself unworthy of self-respect, and false and recreant to all the injunctions of civilization, if I did not say that from the noisome pool of total depravity there never issued a spirit so awfully and irredeemably wicked. Extermination for such a cause—I was almost tempted to say for any cause—is an expression that is not only disgraceful to an American citizen, but it would have been a stigma and a shame in the days of Alaric, Attila, and Saladin. Not only would Christianity shrink from it in unutterable horror, but even Mohammedanism and Paganism would blush to own its paternity. If this is the net result of our Sabbath-school teachings and religious instructions for two hundred years in these United States, we might as well confess that the light of the gospel has not yet reached our shores, and we will have to wait until pagan but converted Christian India sends her missionaries from the banks of the Ganges and from Hindostan to convert us as proud and imperial but pagan Rome received the cross from the barbarians of northern Europe. It is no wonder that this cry for extermination is regarded with mingled horror and amazement in Europe and throughout Christendom, and that judging us by such an idea, they regard us either as a nation of lunatics or hardened criminals.

Happily, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible. The providence of God never has and never will allow such an act of ferocious vengeance.

But, Mr. Chairman, I turn from the contemplation of this most inhuman and barbarous demand for extermination to take a brief view of the financial condition of the country.

One of the most interesting subjects connected with the war is our national debt. There is nothing like it in all history; nothing superior to it in amount; nothing equal to it in the rapidity of its creation, and nothing to be compared to it in the lie which it gives to the loud boasting and vaunting which are constantly heard. We boast, or rather the war party boasts of its disposition to give the last dollar and the last man to the Juggernaut of blood that it worships. But what do they do? They hardly give the first dollar. Not one fifth of the expenses of the war have been paid as it progressed. The other four fifths have been coolly shoved off on posterity. Yes, sir, I repeat: the men who boastingly proclaim their willingness to give the last dollar, now in the heat of the war fever, have never proposed to pay more than one dollar in five. If they, with feelings and passions so strongly enlisted, only pay one fifth, how will posterity, cool and unimpassioned posterity, regard the four fifths? What will capitalists think of the sincerity of their promise, and of the probability of its future redemption? Will they invest, under the belief that the coming generation will pay four fifths to redeem such promise and save the honor of their ancestors? Recurring to the manner in which it was contracted, and remembering the facility with which their ancestors enacted a bankrupt law at the time of its contraction, they may say that those who contracted the debt refused to pay their proper share of it, and be tempted to repudiate the whole.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STILES. I ask that the gentleman have the unanimous consent of the House to conclude his speech.

No objection was made.

Mr. LONG. England, in her tremendous wars with Napoleon and the greater part of continental Europe, which for long years was arrayed on his side, and when her expenses went up to seven hundred million a year, paid one half of the war expenses as she went along. This was an evidence that they were not willing to seek the temporary profits which the war gave and then cast the great burden of the expenses upon posterity. It was an earnest of the last dollar from which our war patriots have recoiled. It took Great Britain eight hundred years to run up a debt less in amount and at a rate of interest not one half as great as that we have incurred in three and a half years.

These eight hundred years reach from William the Conqueror to Victoria. They embrace all her wars of conquest and defense. In them are included the glories of the Edwards and the Henries, of Elizabeth, of Cromwell, of William, of Anne, and the Georges. They call to mind the memories of Agincourt and Cressy, of Blenheim and Waterloo, of Marlborough and Wellington. They embrace the gigantic wars with France, when she was four times conquered, and when her towns were held for years by English garrisons. They include the repulse of the Spanish Armada, the terrible civil war of Cromwell, and the gigantic expenses of her combat with the French Revolution, which alone lasted more than a quarter of a century, and during which she had under her pay and subsidy the hordes of Russians, Austrians, Prussians, and Germans, that twice dethroned Napoleon and twice marched to Paris. They include her seven years' war of coercion upon America for the subjugation of the seceded colonies; and they include the acquisition of a territory in all parts of the globe so immense that upon it the sun never sets. Yes, all this cost less than our three and a half years' miserable, sectional war.

We have been taught to regard the British Government as corrupt and expensive. It has had at its head, and in its councils, many of the most corrupt and dishonest men the world has ever known, and yet, with all its corruption and profligacy, England to-day has a debt less in amount than the audited and unaudited debt, including the contingent war claims, that has already been incurred by this Administration in the prosecution of the war. A few more facts in illustration. The wealth of Great Britain is thirty-two thousand million dollars, that of the so-called loyal States, eleven thousand million dollars. Our debt is the largest, and its interest is twice as great, and yet, Great Britain has three times as much property to be assessed for taxation as the United States. The standing armies of Europe to-day are four and a half million men, which is about equal to the whole number of male adults in the United States, and yet the cost of maintaining these almost fabulous armaments is not half as great as that of the United States. Europe has the accumulated wealth of centuries, she has her two hundred and fifty million people, and she maintains five or six times as many soldiers in the field as we do, at half the expense—I mean at half the expense that we have promised to pay, for not a dollar of it has yet been paid. If Europe is oppressed and ground to the earth with her war expenses, what would be our condition under the actual money system? I do not suppose, Mr. Chairman, that one half, probably not one third, of this debt has been incurred in the legitimate prosecution of the war. The evidences of the debt are not in the pay of the soldiers, who get less than their exposures entitle them to receive, but are to be seen in the marble palaces, in the luxurious equipages that dazzle so resplendently around the persons of the Government contractors; there is where the money has gone which we have promised to pay, and upon which promises they have realized; you will find it accounted for in part in the reports and speeches of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] Traces of it may be seen in the affair of the Cataline, the Opdyke trial, and in other disclosures of a similar character. The substantial reason why Great Britain paid one half of her war expenses as they were incurred, while we pay little or nothing, is because the class of persons to whom the debt in England was owing sat in Parliament and voted the taxes; in our country, on the contrary, it is those who have to assist in paying the debt that have the privilege of enacting the laws. Beyond this, and therefore connected with the payment of this huge incubus, lies the specter of a despotical government, with its aristocracy and its standing army, indispensable auxiliaries in the work.

At the last session, Mr. Chairman, I had the misfortune to fall under the censure of this House, and under the most terrible maledictions outside of it, for expressing my belief, sad and unpalatable as it was to me, that the Constitution and the Union would not, in all human probability, either of them, survive this mad and ruinous war.

What has since happened has not been of a character to cause me to take a more cheering view of the future. Who will say that we are now living under a Government with a written Constitution? What provision of it is there that has not been disregarded and set aside? Of what avail has been your Bill of Rights, and which was made a condition of accession to the Union by the States for the last three years? Where laws, organic or statute, are thus set at defiance and utterly disregarded, they are seldom or never afterward respected. Hear for a moment the utterances of the leading editors and orators of the Administration party in regard to our once venerated Constitution. See the contempt and bitterness with which the most influential organs of public opinion now speak of it.

As for the people, or rather a large portion of them, it is remarkable how complacently they have acquiesced in the overthrow of a Government that was believed to be universally popular. Engaged in the pursuit of wealth and material pleasures, they have apparently taken but little interest in the question, content even to accept a despotism that did not prohibit their sacrifices at the footstool of mammon. Their only idea has been to preserve the territory, the land of the Republic intact; and if that was effected, the form and nature of the Government over it was a secondary consideration. There is and has been a strange theory afloat that it was better to have an extended territory of vast dimensions, if it was a despotism, than a smaller country if it was a Republic. They did not think of spending a dollar or sacrificing a man to maintain free institutions, but they proposed to spend the last dollar, and sacrifice the last man, in order to prevent our map from being curtailed or diminished.

This passion for extended territory is one of the most vulgar, ignoble, and unworthy that ever afflicted a nation. Countries that are influenced by a true spirit and an elevated policy look more to the improvement of the territory they have, and which willingly submits to their jurisdiction, than to its expansion, more to the liberty and well-being of the people who inhabit it than to foreign conquest and dominion. This idea of expansion, acquisition, and dominion has been studiously inculcated by a peculiar and most bombastic literature—our Fourth of July orations. For a long series of years the sum and substance of these orations has been a eulogy upon our immense territory, and all sorts of extravagant figures of speech were used to indicate that it extended from the Lakes to the Gulf, and from ocean to ocean. Thus was the pride of national domination fostered that has since broken out in this fearful and horrible war. Had more been said in our speeches, our orations, and our newspapers about habeas corpus, the right of trial by jury, and other guarantees of personal liberty, of representative government, and the rights, sovereignty, and independence of the States, as the only security for personal liberty; had the people been educated in these great principles, purchased by the blood of our fathers, the present humiliating and deplorable disaster would not have overtaken us.

Another of the worst signs of the times is the national admiration for military glory and grandeur, to be won by any means and at all sacrifices, the very idea that has caused the destruction of republics. France would probably have preserved her free constitution for a considerable period, had she not, in repelling the attacks of Europe upon it, been led astray by the dazzling but gory and empty phantom of military success. It was followed over millions of corpses and over generations of Frenchmen, until from very exhaustion the country fell back into the lethargy of despotism. Republics in all ages have been subverted under the war power. The ermine of the judge and the person of the legislator are helpless against the bayonets of the successful soldier who is sustained by this miserable popular delusion of military glory—some Alexander, some Julius Cæsar, and some Napoleon, has always stamped out with his iron heel the breath of popular liberty. There is still another melancholy delusion worthy of a passing notice—it is that men were made for government and not government for men. Anacharsis Clootz, a fanatical Reform of the Indian System—Mr. Donnelly.

HO. OF REFS.

Prussian baron, during the French Revolution, appeared before the National Assembly at the head of an embassy, and declared that an establishment of the French Republic would be cheaply purchased by the sacrifice of the whole human race.

Rev. Dr. Breckinridge, the President of the Convention that renominated Mr. Lincoln, declared in a political speech in the city in which I reside, his willingness to see this magnificent country all depopulated back to the original settlements of Jamestown and Plymouth rather than have two confederated republics where there is now but one. This is supreme lunacy, and only worthy of a lunatic asylum. Governments are instituted to promote the happiness of men, and they should be subverted when they fail in that end. With a large class of our people the word government implies some huge idol, to which the lives and fortunes of the people are to be sacrificed, and for which, work as it is of human hands, rivers of blood are to flow. We who are unable to agree upon a proper form of government for ourselves, presumptuously affirm that we will manufacture one for our children, as, if we did, they would be likely, judging from the manner in which we have treated the legacy left us by our fathers, long to respect it.

What, then, of the future—the grim, gaunt specter of the future, as it is foreshadowed by the present? We have an immense standing Army; we have a vast national debt; we have an utterly irresponsible Executive, governed by the inclination of his own will; we have a judiciary subservient to arbitrary power, and unable to enforce obedience to its decrees if it were free to do so. We have corruption and profligacy of morals and manners, such as modern times have never before witnessed. We have a worldly and perverted church, and false teachers of religion. Look where we will, we see general demoralization of society, and while we are breaking link by link in the chain that bound the States together, and so changing the Constitution of our fathers as to preclude all possibility of reunion, alienating the people, decimating their numbers, crushing their hopes, and grinding them to the earth with debt, drafts, and taxation, European Powers are setting the Monroe doctrine at defiance, parceling out the continent, and preparing to recognize the confederacy. Is it out of such materials and in the midst of such surroundings that gentlemen expect to erect anew the arch of a reconstructed Union and a violated Constitution? No artificers, Mr. Chairman, are equal to the task. The Union of 1789 is gone, never to be restored. If we who yet claim to be under the forms of the Constitution would save anything from the political and social wreck; if we desire even to make an effort to again recover our lost condition, we must abandon the war, recognize the sovereignty and separate independence of the States and their right of self-government, and then begin the work of reorganization anew in a spirit of mutual compromise and concession, such as was displayed by our fathers when they met in the memorable Convention of 1787.

Mr. Chairman, this may be the last time I shall raise my voice in debate within these walls; perhaps the last time that I may deem it expedient to give my views upon the awful drama through which we are passing. In taking leave of this Capitol I may be pardoned if, in glancing back at the past, I say that there is no part of my political life that I look back to with more pride, no, not pride, but satisfaction, than the efforts which I have made, feeble though they be, to arrest the madness of the hour, and to avert the dark gloom with which we are threatened. Entertaining strong and earnest convictions, I have used language conformable and proper to their expression. Overwhelmed with the importance of the issue, and oppressed with a sense of the national peril, I have in the main discussed events and sentiments, and avoided all offensive allusions to those I deemed the guilty actors in these tragic scenes. In no instance am I aware of having infringed upon the courtesy of debate and the dignity of legislation, and I know that I have exercised no right that did not devolve upon me as a Representative. I have spoken sincerely, candidly, and honestly, and if I have taken a dark and despondent view of the future it would afford me the greatest gratification to see all these dark clouds dispelled, and to see a light beam upon the picture that now gives us promise of being in the horizon. I have no pride of opinion that would interfere with a frank confession of erroneous views, if, against my convictions, and against all reason, and by what would be a special interposition of Providence, the policy of the Administration should preserve the Union intact, and the liberties of the people from being overthrown.

REFORM OF THE INDIAN SYSTEM.

SPEECH OF HON. I. DONNELLY,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1865.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. DONNELLY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The condition of the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States is a matter of the first consequence to our Government and people.

During the first half century after the formation of the Government the flow of population on our continent was confined to a movement from the Atlantic coast westwardly, and the process of displacement of the aboriginal race was comparatively simple: the Indian receded as the white man advanced. Latterly, however, new tides of population have set in from the shores of the Pacific, and the two mighty currents are now commingling their waters amid the gold-bearing ranges of the interior. The emigrant from Minnesota meets in the field of Montana the miner from Oregon and California. With the termination of our great war, now near its close, a migration will spring up of which the world has as yet known no parallel; and in a few short years every tract capable of settlement and cultivation will pass into the occupancy of the white man.

What is to become of the Indian as the races of the world thus draw together from the opposite shores of the continent? Caught between the upper and the nether millstones—now so remorselessly approaching each other—what is to be his fate? The land that will not sustain the white man will not sustain the Indian. The soil whose grasses will not nourish the domestic cattle of the herdsman will not support the buffalo. The Indian must either be driven to starvation in the sterile wastes or we must permit him to share with us the lands capable of cultivation.

Let it not be said that the nation shall advance in its career of greatness regardless of the destruction of the red man. There is room enough in God's world for all the races He has created to inhabit it. Thirty million white people can certainly find space, somewhere on this broad continent, for a third of a million of those who originally possessed the whole of it. While we are inviting to our shores the oppressed races of mankind let us at least deal justly by those whose rights here antedate our own by countless centuries.

It is the destiny of the white man to overrun the world; but it is as plainly his destiny to carry in his train the great forces which constitute his superiority—civilization and Christianity. We are exhibiting to-day the unequalled spectacle of a superior race sharing its noblest privileges with the humblest of mankind, and lifting up to the condition of freedom and happiness those who from the dawn of time have been either barbarians or slaves.

"One touch of nature makes the whole world kin."

Let us then be merciful in our judgment of the races of men. We know not to whose hands the torch of civilization may yet be committed ere the work of God through man is completed on the face of the earth. It was little anticipated by the great nations of antiquity that the religious mind of the world would be dominated for centuries by the intellect of an obscure branch of the Arab race.

If, then, it would be unworthy of us to consider for one moment the alternative of the destruction of the Indians of the United States, let us turn to the other aspect which the problem presents us.

How shall the Indian—a nomad, a hunter, a barbarian—compete on the same soil and under the same circumstances in the great struggle for life with the civilized white man?

Civilization means energy, industry, acuteness, skill, and perseverance. Barbarism means indolence, torpidity, ignorance, and irresolution. How can the two be brought together and the inferior not fall at once a sacrifice to the rapacity of the superior? This is the problem before us.

The Government must interpose its merciful protection between weakness and power. It is doing so in the case of the black man; let it deal as fairly by the red man. Without action by this Government, a thousand years would have left the slave of the South still a slave. Under wise and just laws he will swell at once the power of the nation, increase its resources, and adorn it, in time, with great names and honored services. We cannot afford to be unjust to any portion of mankind.

The Government must shield the Indian in his time of helplessness, and must confer upon him the advantages of civilization.

The depravity, the degradation, the decrease in numbers of the Indians, are but nature's protest against the inequality of the contest carried on between them and the whites. In "the process of natural selection" we have been rapidly eliminating the weak and helpless savage.

What has been the treatment of the Indians by our Government?

No sadder or more gloomy page presents itself in all our annals. Error, neglect, and crime, are written all over it.

Instead of regarding the Indians as savages—helpless as brutes and improvident as children—to be cared for and protected as the courts of law protect idiots and minors; our great nation has descended from the eminence of its Christianity and civilization, and has entered into a struggle to drive the best possible bargain with the savage for his lands. The sight has been a sad one. On the one side one of the great Powers of the globe, of unequalled wisdom, sagacity, and power, represented by shrewd and able agents; and on the other a parcel of poor, untutored savages, scarce comprehending the transaction in which they are engaged, unable to read or sign the "treaty" they make, and living, while they negotiate, upon the bounty of the very Government which professes to meet them on terms of equality. It is needy barbarism, pinched by a thousand wants, competing with an affluent and all-powerful Government. What savage virtue can stand up against the allurements which are spread before it? Even should the tribe have judgment enough to resist the terms proposed to them, are not the chiefs purchasable? And that which blankets and beads, guns and horses cannot effect, shall not rum accomplish? Should the chiefs sign and the tribe resist, are they not savage outlaws, and who shall write their history?

Here are the numbers of some of the tribes with whom the Government has made such treaties: the Pottawatomies of Huron number forty-five members; the Museses of Kansas number forty-four members; the Stockbridges of Kansas number thirteen members.

Is it not a pitiable thought that our beloved Government, instead of measuring out mercy and kindness with a liberal hand to these poor, benighted little communities, should descend to make the best possible terms out of their miseries and necessities?

And what are those terms? The amounts per capita for these tribes are as follows: Pottawatomies of Huron, $8 88 per annum; Museses of Kansas, $9 00; Stockbridges of Kansas, $4 60. With unlimited power in its hands to make its own terms, this Christian Government of the United States of America gives to each Stockbridge Indian of Kansas the sum of $4 60 every year, with which to civilize him, and is then shocked to hear that he spends this miserable pittance in depravity, and remains as wretched a savage as ever! It takes away his lands; it deprives him of the means of support; it leaves him untrained and uneducated; and it gives him $4 60 with which to support himself and become an agriculturist!

Nor is this the strangest part of the performance. Until the treaty is concluded the Indian, in theory, is the equal of the Government. The moment it is made, his sovereignty passes from him as well as his lands. He lives subject to our authority and yet not protected by our laws. We can enforce treaty obligations against him by the strong arm of military power, but for our infractions he has no remedy save resistance, and that means destruction. Does the history of the world anywhere else present such an anomaly? A petty independent Power, in the midst of a mighty sovereignty, overawed by its military force and living upon its bounty.

Nor shall it be thought that the Government has gained pecuniarily by this policy. While it has been niggardly, inhuman, and unchristian, it has, at the same time, been unwise and ruinous.

Since the 4th of March, 1789, the Government has appropriated, directly for the benefit of the Indians, the enormous sum of $89,155,098 32. If to this direct outlay we add the sums incurred by the Government in the Indian wars in Illinois, Florida, Oregon, Minnesota, and other quarters, they will swell this sum to the vast aggregate of at least $150,000,000.

The total number of Indians receiving annuities is 46,365. If we estimate each family to consist of four persons, which is a moderate calculation, and divide this sum of $150,000,000 among the chiefs or heads of families, we shall find that for each of such chiefs the Government has expended the sum of $13,000!

Where now is all this wealth? Has it reached the Indians? Have its accumulations descended from father to son? Do we find it represented to-day among the tribes by comfortable homes and overflowing granaries? No. Upon our western prairies are scattered this miserable, degraded, impoverished people, an everlasting reproach to our Christian nation and a disgrace to humanity. Where, then, are these great sums? They have gone to fill the coffers of those who stood between the Government and the Indian, and deceived the one while they robbed the other.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is my duty to speak of these things. The evil results of this pernicious system have descended upon my own State in fire and blood. An innocent and an unoffending population of white settlers have paid the penalty for years of misgovernment with their lives; and although the scenes of devastation and ruin and horror have passed away from my State, I trust forever, the system still lives, and is already preparing new stores of suffering and calamity for other communities. When I have looked upon the humble homestead of the frontiersman in ashes, and beheld the corpse of its owner lying gashed and bloody beside it, I could not but trace home the terrible responsibility for all this evil to this Capitol, and to that system which, taking charge of a savage race, retained them in barbarism, made no proper efforts for their civilization, and at last turned them loose like wild beasts, to glut their brutal passions and infuriated rage upon an unsuspecting people.

I assert unhesitatingly, and upon mature reflection, that not even our white race could rise from barbarism to civilization against the pressure of such a system as that under and by means of which it is proposed to civilize the Indians.

Let us look at some of its details.

One of the Red Lake Chippewa chiefs of Minnesota said but two years since, when solicited to part with the lands of his tribe: "When we sell our lands we dig our graves."

The savage had summed up the question in a sentence. The Indian is a hunter, and requires large areas of land in which to find his support. Deprive him of these lands, fill them with a white population, which drives out the wild game, and at the same time give him no instruction to enable him to compete in the arts of agriculture with the white man, and he becomes, perforce, a vagabond, a thief, and, it may be, an assassin.

The civilization of the Indian becomes, therefore, a matter of the first necessity to the comfort and safety of his white neighbor. Injustice to him is injury to ourselves.

"This sword's hilt is the sharpest, and cuts through The hand that wields it."

But what is the course of the Government? It concentrates upon a small strip of land the population for whose sustenance the whole of the ceded territory was before necessary. It surrounds this fragment, this island of barbarism, with a dense civilized white population. The savages must either remain upon his reservation and starve or invade the precincts of the white man and beg and steal. The strain is too great for human nature. Collisions follow, and both white and red are speedily involved in common suffering and ruin, equally victims of a pernicious system.

But it may be said that the Indian can become an agriculturist on his reservation.

Civilization is a tender plant. Centuries of contact with the Roman power left our ancestors still savages. When, at last, the spark of civilization was warmed into a little flame, how many slow and weary ages did it take to light up the horizon with its blaze? The lapse of thousands of years extends between the nomad of eastern Europe, who carried the scalp of his enemy at his saddle-bow, and the highly refined citizen of England or America. Shall we then hope that by the mere power of the human will and the force of a few legislative enactments we shall, in a fortnight, turn a band of savages, collected on their reservation like cattle in an inclosure, into civilized men?

The Government seems to have possessed some faint conception of what was required of it. It employs a farmer for the tribe, it hires a blacksmith, and it furnishes some agricultural implements. These are, it is true, glimpses of the truth; but there it stops. What is the result? The Indian who has industry and energy enough to cultivate a field and raise a crop lies at the mercy of every roaming vagabond of the tribe, who, returning bootless from his hunting excursions, descends upon his store of maize and potatoes, and renefts.

"The good old rule, the simple plan,
That they shall take who have the power,
And they shall keep who can."

There is no military or police force to protect industry against robbery. What white man would overcome all the prejudices of education, all the habits of years, all the teachings of superstition, and endure the cold of winter and the heat of summer, to find, at last, the results of his labor swept away from him by some idle and savage neighbor?

Nor is this all. This insecurity extends to the very fields the Indian cultivates. It has been the policy of the Government to withhold from him that encouragement to labor which accompanies possession of the soil. If it is true, as believed by some, that a system of periodical redistribution of the land among all the members of the clan arrested the growth of civilization in the British islands for centuries, what shall we say of this system, which deprives the Indian of his field, not periodically, but at the bidding of a distant and unseen power, or which leaves him a mere occupant and squatter, open at any moment to invasion by his more powerful white neighbors? Again, I ask, what white man could be induced to labor to enhance the value of his fields if the very increase of their value tended only to hurry him more rapidly from them? Who is he that toils willingly for the advantage of another?

But even this is not all. It was said by some one of old, "If vice were on the whole profitable, then the wise man would be the villain." The essence of virtue is that it meets with its reward. Hence any system of Government that rewards equally vice and virtue, indolence and industry, is corrupt and rotten, and can breed only the most disastrous consequences. And yet this is the system adopted by us in our treatment of the Indians! The annuities are distributed among the members of the tribe without any regard whatever to the conduct of the recipients. The ruffian, who robs his industrious neighbor, draws an equal share with the poor wretch he has despoiled. Nay, more, he may go outside of the reservation and prey upon the adjacent white population, and the claims of the white man for the damages he inflicts are paid by the agent out of the total fund of the tribe; so that the many who are innocent suffer for the one who is guilty. In such a state of society the highest premiums are offered for crime and disorder; and it may well be believed that the most sagacious would find it to their interest to become the most vicious.

I need not here enlarge upon that other evil, and parent of many evils, the unjust treatment of the Indians by their agents. I do not assert that all those who occupy or have occupied such positions have proved themselves dishonest; but I do believe that, under the present system, the temptations are too strong for ordinary human virtue. The agent finds himself far away from white society, in the midst of a barbarous population, sunk in ignorance and debauchery and regardless of their own interests; while through his hands pass large sums of money intended for their benefit. He is asked to protect those who cannot protect themselves; to deal honestly by those who are unable to bring him to account; and to feel his responsibility to morality and justice in an almost irresponsible position. Until we can find among the followers of the great parties of the day a sufficient number of pure-minded and disinterested philanthropists to fill all these agencies, and to endure exile, discomfort, and small salaries for honesty and righteousness' sake, we must expect this evil to continue. The evil is in the system, not in the men who represent it. If the reproach can be addressed to our Government which was made to Tiberius: "It is you that are to blame for these things, that have committed your flocks, not to shepherds, but to wolves;" the deeper reproach can also be uttered against us, that we have for years permitted a system which by its own force has created those wolves even out of the most trusted of our shepherds.

The course of these remarks will indicate what, in my humble judgment, should be the course adopted by the Government toward the Indians.

In the first place, the whole system of treaties should be abrogated. We have filled a thousand octavo pages of our statutes with such useless compacts. We need no such plea to justify us in taking the lands of the Indians. If one hundred human beings can support themselves on a tract of land where one savage finds a precarious subsistence, the one hundred have a right to go there and take possession of and cultivate it. The right of man to life and to the earth as a means of life is paramount to all else. But in seizing the Indian's territory, the new-comers must not consign him to starvation; they must share the land with him, and teach him those arts by which a small portion of it will sustain him as fully as the whole did formerly.

In the next place, whatever land is given to the Indian should be given him by irrevocable patent; so that he can never be disturbed in his possession by the pressure of an advancing population. It should also be guarded in such manner that he cannot, for many years, sell or encumber it. The Government must treat him in this respect as its helpless and dependent ward.

In the next place, it would be well that each reservation should be located near to or surrounding a military post, so as to secure at all times a perfect administration of justice through the military authorities, and full protection to the industrious and deserving from the vicious and depraved.

In the next place, there should be erected for each family a comfortable log house; and a field should be broken sufficient for their support upon the land patented to them by the Government. They should be furnished with sufficient tools, seed, and working cattle for its cultivation. The aid of the Government should then be given liberally to the most deserving, leaving the worthless to work or starve. A few successful farmers would civilize a whole community, even as among ourselves a few cultivated persons will refine an entire neighborhood.

In the next place, while it is recollected that the knowledge of a civilized language does not constitute civilization, nevertheless the English language should be introduced among them; and the education of their children should at the same time be made compulsory.

It should be recollected that civilization consists of certain habits of life, productive of comfort and ease; upon these may repose a higher structure of generous thoughts and ennobling religious impulses. Christianity does not consist in the holding of certain points of doctrinal belief, nor in the employment of any particular routine of expression, but in that adaptation of the whole inner nature of the man to the purity and elevation of its great principles. Hence it can never be the religion of savages. To leave the Indian in his barbarian state and at the same time seek to force into his mind the sublime doctrines of the Sermon on the Mount, is to attempt nature in an inverted order. The religious influence of the nation should therefore first lend itself to a reformation of the general system. Having prepared the soil it can then proceed with some hope of success to the process of the cultivation of the individual.

But how, it may be asked, are we to avoid the corruption so generally admitted?

I answer, by some such system of checks as is used in all other departments to insure honesty. Why cannot the law provide that the various goods distributed among the Indians shall be dealt out by the military officer of the post, or by the quartermaster of the post, taking their receipts, witnessed by the agent? The report of the military officer could thus be compared with the report of the agent, and fraud could only follow by collusion between them. The military officer, holding his place for life, would have much less inducement to fraud than the agent who anticipates removal in a short period of time.

It might also be well to locate the reservations of the Indians outside of the organized States, and as far as possible from the white settlements. In this way their new customs and usages will have attained some solidity before they are brought into contact with the whites. When the wave of population rolls around the reservation, the white pioneer will find the red man a farmer like himself, occupying land held like his own by irrevocable patent, and possessing some share of intelligence and education with which to understand and defend his rights. No longer vicious and thieving, he will recognize in him a quiet and peaceable neighbor, and will feel no desire and be under no necessity to drive him from his home.

I would further suggest that while a tract of one or two hundred acres of land should be given to each family, that the tribe should be gathered together in villages, with a house for each family surrounded by five or ten acres of cultivated land. An Indian family will not ordinarily use more than that amount. When the energy of any individual oversteps this limit he can cultivate his separate farm. It requires the highest types of the highest races to encounter a life of isolation and solitude upon large farms on the frontier. The weaker races are gregarious. Moreover, thus assembled they are more susceptible of control and instruction.

In fact this system of concentration could, in course of time, be applied to all the Indians within the limits of the United States. Their total number is but 314,622. They could be concentrated, if civilized, upon an area no larger than two or three of our counties; they could be speedily made self-sustaining; and instead of inflicting injuries on our frontiers to a degree vastly disproportionate to their numbers, they could be converted into harmless agriculturists and peaceful citizens.

But the question may be asked, is the Indian capable of civilization? I answer unhesitatingly, yes.

The Indian of the American continent has proved himself not only capable of receiving but of originating civilization.

It may be safely said that the Spaniards encountered in Mexico and Peru an indigenous civilization in many respects higher than their own.

The conquerors of Peru found that country, covering a narrow tract of land along the sea-coast, four thousand miles in length and three hundred miles in width, and containing a population of thirty millions;—nearly equal to the entire population of the United States.

The civilization of the Peruvians was not of sudden growth. It had extended through many centuries. The people were agriculturists, and the pursuit had been carried to a degree of refinement unknown at that time in Europe. To this day the curious traveler finds upon the tops of the mountain ranges, in some cases thirteen thousand feet above the level of the sea and amid the haunts of the eagle, the crumbling walls and vast monuments, which bespeak the civilization of the ancient people.

Nor was this civilization rude and immature. Of its kind it was perfect. Almost every foot of their vast territory was brought under subjugation to the labor of man. So dense was the population and so energetic the efforts of industry, that the soil of the valleys was carried up on the backs of the peasants to the elevated sides of the mountains and crops raised as high as the limits of vegetation.

Of this unfortunate people, nine tenths have wasted away before the white man. The valley of Santa, for instance, which once maintained seven hundred thousand inhabitants, does not now contain twelve thousand. The city of Cuzco, which at the time of the Conquest was larger than Chicago, does not now number twenty thousand souls.

When we turn to the Mexicans we find still more striking evidences of the indigenous development of the Indian mind.

That interesting people possessed at the time of their conquest a perfectly organized form of government. The monarch was elected from the royal family by the votes of the nobles. A regular administration of justice prevailed. For each great city there was a supreme court, with a single judge; and below these, in each province, an inferior court of three members; and below these again the local magistracy elected by the people. A right of appeal lay from one court to another, but the decision of the supreme court was final, and the judges were independent of the power of the Crown. The laws were registered and exhibited to the people in their hieroglyphical character. "The rites of marriage," says Prescott, "were celebrated with as much formality as in any Christian country, and the institution was held in such reverence that a tribunal was instituted for the sole purpose of determining questions relating to it." Tax gatherers were distributed throughout the empire. The tributes consisted of "cotton dresses; mantles of feather-work; ornamented armor; vases and plates of gold; gold dust; bands and bracelets; crystal, gilt, and varnished jars and goblets; bells, arms, and utensils of copper; reams of paper; grain, fruit, copal, amber, cochineal, cocoa, timber, and lime." Hospitals were established in the principal cities, for the cure of the sick and the permanent refuge of the disabled soldiers, and surgeons placed over them, "who were so far better than those in Europe," says an old chronicler, "that they did not protract the cure in order to increase the pay."

Prescott thus described the advance of Cortes and his followers over the great southern causeway through the lake to the island on which the city of Mexico stands:

"Everywhere the conquerors beheld the evidence of a crowded and thriving population exceeding all they had yet seen. The temples and principal buildings were covered with hard white stucco, which glistened like enamel in the level beams of the morning. The margin of the great basin was more thickly gemmed than that of Chalco with towns and hamlets. The water was darkened by swarms of canoes filled with Indians, who clambered up the sides of the causeway, and gazed with curious astonishment on the strangers. And here, also, they beheld those fairy islands of flowers, overshadowed occasionally by trees of considerable size, rising and falling with the gentle undulation of the billows. The Spaniards had occasion more than ever to admire the mechanical science of the Aztecs in the geometrical precision with which the causeway was executed, as well as the solidity of its construction. It was composed of huge stones well laid in cement, and wide enough throughout its whole extent for ten horsemen to ride abreast."

A few facts may serve to call up a picture of the great city of Mexico as it existed at the time of the conquest:—

It contained from three to five hundred thousand inhabitants. Its extent was such that one thousand persons were daily engaged in watering and cleaning the streets, so that, in the language of a Spaniard "a man could walk through them with as little danger of soiling his feet as his hands." An aqueduct nearly three miles in length, with double courses of pipes, brought supplies of fresh water from Chapultepec. The palace of the king excelled, in the judgment of Cortes, any building in Spain in cost and magnificence. Immense buildings and grounds were devoted to collections of the native birds and beasts of the country—the zoölogical gardens of the city; while an equal space was appropriated to a botanical collection whose medicinal virtues were studied by the Aztecs. In the great market-place were met together traders from all parts of the empire, with the products and manufactures peculiar to their countries—goldsmiths, potters, jewelers, painters, stone-cutters, hunters, fishermen, fruiters, and florists. Piles of cotton bales or of manufactured goods, furs, or feather garments, met the sight. In the booths around the barber was plying his vocation, or the apothecary dispensing his drugs; while even the bookseller was to be found selling blank books for the hieroglyphical picture-writing. Perfect order reigned throughout the vast assembly, numbering often forty thousand persons. Officers patrolled the square, whose business it was to keep the peace, to collect the duties imposed on the articles sold, and to see that no false measures or frauds of any kind were used. A court of twelve judges sat in the square to administer justice to all offenders.

I refer to these interesting facts as an evidence that the mind of the red man has been capable, unaided and alone, of originating a comparatively high order of civilization.

It may be urged in reply that the Aztecs and the ordinary Indians of our western prairies are two distinct races. This is not so. They are but different tribes of the same race. The construction of their languages, as well as their physical conformation, evidence that all the varieties of the red man on both the continents are ethnologically members of the same race. The Aztecs were a wild tribe who descended upon the more civilized Toltecs, and in a few centuries passed from a condition analogous to that of our western Indians to the one in which Cortes found them. If, then, it was possible for the red man to create, of his own force, a civilization, can it be doubted that it is in the power of a superior race, under just and wise laws, to communicate civilization to him?

In these remarks I have sought to avoid considering this question in any of its philanthropic aspects; but have endeavored to prove that the civilization of the Indian is of the first consequence to the white man, whether the subject be regarded in its pecuniary relations or with a view to the safety of our frontier population. The Indian misgoverned, oppressed, and treated unjustly, must always be a brutal and a dangerous neighbor. The Indian trained under wise, just laws, honestly executed, may become in time a good citizen and a practical Christian, a credit to his race and a benefit to his country. We can neither destroy nor ignore three hundred thousand human beings with the same right to life which we ourselves possess; nor can we, if we regard simply our own safety, permit their slow destruction by misgovernment. We will find, as we have already found, amid suffering and desolation,

"That we but teach
Bloody instructions; which being taught, return
To plague the inventors."

But there is beyond all this other considerations which elevate this question to even a higher dignity.

We of the northern races of Europe expelled the Indian as we colonized the country; but in the regions of the continent settled by the Latin races this has not been the case. In Mexico, in Central America, and in South America, the aboriginal population continued in the occupancy of the land, and from the time of their conquest they have been steadily absorbing by intermarriage the European blood among them, so that at this day those countries possess less of white blood than they did a century since. As the native population awakens from the torpidity of subjugation and begins to feel the power of superior numbers, it is seeking to regain political ascendancy. The Creole population does not increase in numbers; the Indian, on the contrary, is advancing with rapid strides. To-day, in Peru proper, the whites are but 240,000; the mixed bloods and negroes 340,000, while the Indians are 1,620,000, or more than three times the entire population of every other kind. From a condition of slavery they have risen into freedom. Formerly excluded from the schools, even as our own slaves were excluded in the South, all the institutions of learning are now thrown open to them, and they are entering in large numbers the colleges of the country.

While we find Mexico electing, in the person of Juarez, an Indian to its presidency, we are at the same time informed that secret movements are on foot to reestablish the sovereignty of the ancient race in Peru, Bolivia, Ecuador, and Chili.

Let us not be blind to these great movements; they are God's solution of the vexed questions of race which now agitate the world. Who shall say that the Indian shall not, through the instrumentality of our institutions and under the protection of our great Government, establish once more upon this continent the civilization of the Montezumas and the Incas, kindled into new splendor by the genius of universal liberty, and softened into refined beauty by the touch of Christianity? The custodians of a civilization which we did not originate, we have no right to withhold it from those races, whatever may be their color, with whom we may come in contact; nor can the nation find a nobler task than that of so bending its energies that this entire New World, from one extremity to the other, shall exult, through all its diversities of climate and all its zones of color, in one continuous and unending display of human industry and happiness. In that not distant day, when vast communities of black men along the Gulf, and still larger communities of red men in Mexico and South America, shall be united to us by all the affiliations of commerce and all the sympathy of kindred institutions, let us not have to reproach ourselves with having destroyed or permitted the destruction of any portion of the people of this continent. Let it not be said of us that while we were reflecting civilization and liberty upon the world, we at the same time exterminated the aboriginal population of our own country.

BUREAU OF MINES AND MINERALS.

SPEECH OF HON. CORNELIUS COLE, OF CALIFORNIA, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 7, 1865.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. COLE, of California, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: A bill to establish a mining department has been upon the files of the House for several weeks past, and I doubt not it has received a due share of the attention of every member. But to obtain for it, if possible, a more practical consideration, I solicit attention for a few moments.

The last seventeen years have disclosed the fact that more than one third of the entire territory of the United States is rich in the precious metals. This fact was utterly unknown prior to the Mexican war, the events of which are still fresh in the recollection of us all. This mineral region is already divided into three States and seven Territories, the latter of which, at no distant day, will be erected into as many or a larger number of States. It all lies west of what was once known as the great American desert—the plains—and is distinguished from the rest of the United States by its numerous and lofty ranges of mountains. In the dark fastnesses of these mountains, for thousands of ages, nature concealed her choicest treasures, and only permitted them to be brought forth at last to adorn her youngest and fairest daughter, the American Republic.

The business of developing these mineral resources is yet in its infancy. With such assistance as Government could easily and cheaply render, but which individuals and private companies cannot command, it would be vastly increased. The honorable Secretary of the Interior gives it as his opinion that the already discovered silver mines of Nevada alone, if supplied with proper machinery, would yield $120,000,000 a year; and from the knowledge I have of the Humboldt, the Reese river, and other districts far in the interior and out of reach of the ordinary appliances, I regard his estimate as in nowise extravagant. The new discoveries of similar mines that are daily and almost hourly made in Nevada, and in Idaho and Arizona, and all over our Pacific possessions, show that the production of the precious metals is capable of being increased far beyond any estimate yet attempted by the honorable Secretary. For the purpose of bringing up to a proper standard this yield of gold and silver he has recommended in his late report "the establishment of a bureau of mines and minerals;" and he tells us that before many years such legislation "will be found necessary if it has not already become so." But there can be no more convincing proof of the present necessity for such action than the fact that these mines now yield only a tithe of what they are capable of yielding. There is, therefore, no occasion for delay. This lame and struggling interest—for such it is—demands at the hands of Government immediate measures for its development.

The main object of this bill is to collect and diffuse useful information touching the location, extent, and character of the mines, and the best modes and means of working them; and why should it not receive a consideration equal to that which the Government has been accustomed to bestow upon other industrial and intellectual pursuits? Agriculture has long been a subject of its fostering care. Even before the establishment of a Bureau of Agriculture the products of the field and the fold were stimulated by many congressional enactments, and finally, as a crowning incentive to this branch of industry, a homestead on the public lands was donated to every farmer that would go out and occupy it. To excite greater exertions in the more risky business of fishing, liberal bounties were provided out of the general Treasury. The author and inventor is secured in the profits of his work, and almost every species of manufacturing and mechanical industry has been favored by duties, tariffs, and rewards, in one form or another. The production of gold and silver is no less worthy the national solicitude, and from the influence these metals exert on every pursuit in life, their production would seem to be the most fitting object of governmental charge. By common consent they are and will always remain the medium of exchange among nations. Their value in this respect has been in nowise impaired by the increased production of them which followed the acquisition of California. Any excess above the demands of commerce has been devoted to purposes of art and ornament. The scope of their usefulness is absolutely unlimited. They build your houses and ships, and their agency is indispensable in all public works. They marshal armies and put fleets afloat. Cities and empires grow with their abundance or decline without them. Religion, civilization, liberty—all that men live for or die for—lean upon them as upon a staff. Their withdrawal from any community operates as a dire calamity, producing distress and death. In their absence the farmer ceases his labors, the merchant closes his doors, the arms of the artisan and mechanic are unnerved, the hum of the factory is hushed, commerce folds her wings and her messengers chafe their chains in stagnant ports.

It is somewhat remarkable, in view of these considerations, that the production of the precious metals has not been encouraged with the same fostering care and patronage which has been extended toward other pursuits. But this is doubtless owing, in a measure, to the strange yet common fallacy that pictures some magic instead of misery in the mining process; some cunning alchemy, and no hard labor, as the means of bringing gold and silver to light. It would seem that the illusions of the nursery and the enchantments of the Arabian Nights were mingled with the ideas which men bring to bear upon the subject of the production of the precious metals. They contemplate the exhibitions of gold in the broker's window, but never realize the condition of the laborer whose eyes first it gladdened. They do not descend into the deep, dark, damp artificial caverns of the earth, where the patient miner wastes his life in gathering it little by little, toiling day and night. In the busy city and outside world gold has its offices to perform; it disseminates beneficent influences, and makes millions happy; but the happiness of him who digs it is only the happiness of hope. Of all the throng who visited the gold fields of California only a few have been able to return to tell of their experiences. With the great majority mining has been a failure, a sad disappointment. Merchants and tradesmen have amassed wealth in the Golden State, and many such have become known abroad, and are often erroneously identified with the pursuit of mining; while the real gold digger, out of whose necessities they grew rich, is never heard of. He has no remittances to make, and no testimony to give. His story has few attractions for the public ear, and the real character of the business of gold seeking, which is the most uncertain and illy-requited business in the world, remains unknown beyond the immediate scene of its prosecution.

The separation of gold dust from the alluvium with which it is deposited by washing was for a long time the only method of mining in California, and is still the process employed in the placer diggings. But this process was early beset with many obstacles, and had not American energy brought the accustomed agencies to bear this description of mining would long since have ceased in that State. Extensive deposits of metal were frequently found in localities remote from water, and projects were set on foot and successfully carried out to supply the needed element. There are now in California hundreds of miles of great aqueducts, by turns perforating and winding around the mountains, surmounting dizzy abysses and creeping through tangled, rocky gorges, leading the floods from the upper Sierras down to the places of usefulness. But nevertheless placer mining is growing every day more precarious, difficult, and expensive. Many of the deposits have become exhausted, or have ceased to be remunerative. Of the swarms of men once eagerly engaged in this pursuit a large majority have turned their hands to farming, to mechanical occupations, or followed the tides of migration to fresher fields beyond the borders of the State. A few have traced up and found those leads from which the disseminated particles of gold are supposed to have come, and have bent their attention to quartz mining. This always involves great labor and expense, and is profitable in only one case out of many. California has but little to show for the sixteen years of labor in which nearly all her people have been engaged. Her mines, indeed, have attracted to her shores an active and enterprising population; otherwise they have been of but little real benefit to her. Many mining settlements and once flourishing villages are entirely abandoned, or given over to the Chinese, who are content to work for a mere pittance. The acres, roods, and miles of earth thrown up, rivers turned from their channels, mountains leveled, and rocks penetrated, while they attest the immensity of the treasure developed, at the same time indicate the magnitude of the labor performed, and show that gold mining is the least fanciful of all pursuits.

But a small proportion of the vast wealth extracted from the mines of California lingers upon her shores. It cannot be doubted that had the same amount of labor been devoted to some more steady but less enticing occupations, the State and people would have been richer and far more prosperous.

Such is a brief review of gold mining in California. Of the country over the mountains to the east we have but slender knowledge. We know, to be sure, that a little strip of land at Virginia City, only six hundred feet wide and two miles in length, yields more than $1,000,000 a month in silver. This is worked out by a hundred costly crushing mills, which have been erected within the last half dozen years.

The extent of this silver-bearing country is a geographical fact. It reaches from the Sierra Nevada to the eastern base of the Rocky mountains, a thousand miles in width, and is not limited by the British possessions on the north, nor by Mexico on the south. It embraces part of California and Oregon, and Washington Territory; all of silver-girdled Nevada, of Idaho, Montana, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, and Colorado. Much of it is yet unexplored, but so much of it as has been prospected proves to be wonderfully prolific in the precious metals. With the exception of a few mining towns and the Salt Lake communities it is an uninhabited desert, valuable only for its minerals. The total white population of this vast region will scarcely double that of the District of Columbia. In its present condition it separates California from the Atlantic States as by a great gulf, rendering communication between them difficult, dangerous, and expensive. The most practical route of travel to our Pacific coast involves two long sea voyages, and a passage through a tropical foreign country and most inhospitable climate. Its commerce floats seventeen thousand miles around Cape Horn. This travel and trade could and should be conducted on a direct line over our own territory, and when the intermediate space between here and the Pacific becomes occupied, its natural channel will be found there.

The settlement of this great desert therefore assumes importance, whether viewed as a military, political, or commercial measure; and it is fortunate that the presence of the precious metals furnishes an inducement to overcome this barrier. Under judicious management settlements will soon spring up all over these territories, binding together with indissoluble bonds the Occident and the Orient forever. And this is no small consideration. It is one that should arrest the attention of every patriot. It is easier to reach Europe, Asia, Africa, or South America, than the Pacific States, and I regard it essential to the lasting integrity of the Republic that these widely-severed portions should be united more closely together. Most of the Californians were born on this side of the mountains, and their loyalty to the Government of their fathers is unyielding, but a generation is growing up on the Pacific coast, few of whom, as things now stand, can ever see the homes of their ancestors. These, no matter how well instructed in lessons of patriotism, are more likely to become alienated in their feelings if the separation continues. Though we may seem secure at this time, no one can promise for any subsequent generation on that far-distant shore. If a pretense for separation was found in States interlocked as were the North and the South, how much greater would seem to be the danger when the separation is by thousands of miles, by mountain ranges and broad deserts? We might therefore well feel much concern for the future unity of these States were we always, or even long, to remain thus disconnected. But all danger upon this point will subside when the country between here and the Pacific becomes filled up with an industrious, reading, thinking population; and the establishment of a mining bureau will tend greatly to secure this most desirable end. Promulgate authentic information upon the subject of mining, and people will occupy those lonely valleys, and the now silent hills will soon reverberate with the music of industry. Truly is our anxiety for the passage of this bill stimulated by our desire for a perpetual Union. The mixed population that is to inhabit these desert wilds will be instructed to look upon the Federal Government not only as the center of power, but also of light and beneficence. As the sun illuminates the pathway of the planets while it holds them in their orbits, so the General Government, enlightening these embryo States, will bind them more firmly to our system.

But these considerations are only incidental to this measure. Its main object is to augment the production of the precious metals. This is rendered the more necessary by the financial embarrassment which attends the rebellion. If this branch of industry is properly encouraged, and not fettered by unfriendly legislation, as has been proposed by inconsiderate persons, it will in the future afford the ways and means of relief in many a national emergency. Though among the most needful pursuits to the public, mining has been left to grope its way in the dark for want of a little light which Government could easily have dispensed. Lack of information and experience has met the miner on the threshold, and attended him through years of trial and failure. Owing to the character of the country intervening between different districts, and their distance from each other, there can be but little interchange of opinions among them, and hence the necessity for some central fountain-head of enlightenment. It cannot be doubted that the experience of each miner would be valuable to all others. From many experiences useful facts and scientific rules are deducible. Save a few private cabinets of minerals, and a little instruction in the elements of geology and mineralogy dispensed at the schools, there exists in America no source of information upon this great subject. No steps have been taken to practicalize theories of mining, nor to collate and digest into laws and rules the multitudes of facts and experiences which our American mining operations have developed.

This great want the bill I have introduced proposes to supply, and much besides. When it shall have only in part accomplished its work, we will no longer be under the necessity of sending our most valuable ores over mountain and sea to the laboratories of Europe for reduction; nor will the superintendency of our best mines longer remain in the hands of foreigners to our disgrace. Our people will cease their wanderings in Mexico and the British possessions. American fields will present greater attractions than those of our neighbors. Plans and processes will be simplified and economized, new districts will be opened, tardy developments hastened, and minerals now considered refractory will be worked with profit. Such are only a few of the advantages that will flow from the passage of this bill, and the subject certainly merits so much consideration at the hands of Government.

Radicalism and Conservatism—Truth of History Vindicated.

SPEECH OF HON. G. W. JULIAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1865.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the President's message—

Mr. JULIAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Perhaps no task could be more instructive or profitable, in these culminating days of the rebellion, than a review of the shifting phases of thought and policy which have guided the Administration in its endeavors to crush it. Such a retrospect will help us to vindicate the real truth of history, both as to measures and men. It will bring out, in the strongest colors, the contrast between Radicalism and Conservatism, as rival political forces, each maintaining a varying control over the conduct of the war. It will, at the same time, point out and emphasize those pregnant lessons of the struggle, which may best supply the Government with counsel in its further prosecution. The faithful performance of this task demands plainness of speech; and I shall not shrink from my accustomed use of it, in the interests of truth and freedom.

At the beginning of this war, Mr. Chairman, neither of the parties to it comprehended its character and magnitude. Its actual history has been an immeasurable surprise to both, and to the whole civilized world. The rebels evidently expected to make short work of it. Judging us by our habitual and long-continued submission to southern domination, and confiding in the multiplied assurances of sympathy and help which they had received from their faithful allies in the North, they regarded the work of dismemberment as neither difficult nor expensive. They did not dream of the grand results which have proceeded from their mad enterprise. Nor does their delusion seem to have been at all strange or unnatural. Certainly, it was not more remarkable than the infatuation of the Administration, and its conservative friends. The Government understood the conflict as little and misunderstood it as absolutely as its foes. This, sir, is one of the lessons of the war which I think it worth while to have remembered. This revolt, it was believed, was simply a new and enlarged edition of southern bluster. The Government did not realize the inexorable necessity of actual war, because it lacked the moral vision to perceive the real nature of the contest. To every suggestion of so dire an event it turned an averted face and a deaf ear. It hoped to restore order by making a show of war, without actually calling into play the terrible enginery of war. It trusted in the form without the power of war, just as some people have trusted in the form without the power of godliness. It will be remembered that just before the battle of Ball's Bluff, General McClellan ordered Colonel Stone to "make a slight demonstration against the rebels," which might "have the effect to drive them from Leesburg." The Government seems to have pursued a like policy in dealing with the rebellion itself. "A slight demonstration," it was believed, would "have the effect" to arrest the rebels in their madness, and reestablish order and peace in about "sixty days," without allowing them to be seriously hurt, and without unchaining the tiger of war at all. The philosophy of General Patterson, who kindly advised that the war on our part should be "conducted on peace principles," was by no means out of fashion with our rulers and the conservative leaders of opinion generally. Even the Commander-in-Chief of our Army and Navy scouted the idea of putting down the rebellion by military power. He thought the country was to be saved by giving up the principles it had fairly won by the ballot in the year 1860, and to the maintenance of which the new Administration was solemnly pledged. He believed in "conciliation," in "compromise"—the meanest word in the whole vocabulary of our politics, except perhaps, the word "conservative"—and had far less faith in the help of bullets and bayonets in managing the rebels than in the power of our brotherly love to meet their susceptible hearts and woo them back, gently and lovingly, to a sense of their madness and their crime. Our distinguished Secretary of State declared that "none but a despotic or imperial Government would seek to subjugate thoroughly disaffected sovereignties." The policy of coercing the revolted States was disavowed by the President himself in his message to Congress of July, 1861.

Nor did the legislative department of the Government, at that time, disagree with the executive. On the 22d day of July of the same year—and I say it with sorrow and shame—on the very morning following the first battle of Bull Run, the House of Representatives, speaking in the form of solemn legislative resolves, as did the Senate two days later, declared that it was not the purpose of the Government to "subjugate" the villains who began this work of organized and inexcusable rapine and murder. Indeed, it was not then the fashion to call them villains. In the very polite and gingerly phrase of the times they were styled "our misguided fellow-citizens," and "our erring southern brethren," while the rebel States themselves were lovingly referred to as "our wayward sisters." The truth is, that for about a year and a half of this war the policy of tenderness to the rebels so swayed the Administration that it seemed far less intent upon crushing the rebellion by arms, than upon contriving "how not to do it." General McClellan, who so long palsied the energies and balked the purpose of the nation, would not allow an unkind word to be uttered in his presence against the rebel leaders. If an officer or soldier was heard to speak disrespectfully of the great confederate chief, he was summarily reprimanded, while the unrivaled reprobate and grandest of national cut-throats was pronounced a high-souled gentleman and man of honor! Not the spirit of war, but the spirit of peace, seemed to dictate our principles of action and measures of policy toward the men who had resolved, at whatever hazard or sacrifice, to break up the Government by force. This policy, sir, had it been continued, would have proved the certain triumph of the rebel cause. With grand armies in the field, and all the costly machinery of war in our hands, our opportunities were sinned away by inactivity and delay, while the rebels gathered strength from our indecision and weakness. A major general in our Army, and as brave and patriotic a man as lives, said to me in the early stages of the war that the grand obstacle to our success was the lack of resentment on our part toward traitors. He said we did not adequately hate them; and he urged me, if in any degree in my power, to breathe into the hearts of the people in the loyal States a spirit of righteous indignation and wrath toward the rebels, commensurate with the unmatched enormity of their deeds. This spirit, Mr. Chairman, was a military necessity. The absence of it furnishes the best explanation of our failures during the period referred to, while its acceptance by the Government inau-gured the new policy which has ever since been giving us victories.

That this sickly policy of an inoffensive war has naturally prolonged the struggle, and greatly augmented its cost in blood and treasure, no one can doubt. That it belongs, with its entire legacy of frightful results, exclusively to the conservative element in our politics, which at first ruled the Government, is equally certain. The radical men saw at first, as clearly as they see to-day, the character and spirit of this rebel revolt. The massacre at Fort Pillow, the starvation of our soldiers at Richmond, and the whole black catalogue of rebel atrocities have only been so many verified predictions of the men who had studied the institution of slavery, and who regarded the rebellion as the natural fruit and culmination of its Christless career. And hence it was that in the very beginning of the war, radical men were in favor of its vigorous prosecution. They knew the foe with whom we had to wrestle. In language employed on this floor more than three years ago, they knew that "sooner than fail in their purpose the rebels would light up heaven itself with the red glare of the pit, and convert the earth into a carnival of devils." They knew that "every weapon in the armory of war must be grasped, and every arrow in our quiver sped toward the heart of a rebel." They knew that "all tenderness to such a foe is treason to our cause, murder to our people, faithlessness to the grandest and holiest trust ever committed to a free people." They knew that "the war should be made just as terrific to the rebels as possible, consistently with the laws of war, not as a work of vengeance, but of mercy, and the surest means of our triumph." They knew that in struggling with such a foe we were shut up to one grand and inevitable necessity and duty, and that was entire and absolute subjugation. All this was avowed and insisted upon by the earnest men who understood the nature of the conflict, and as persistently disavowed and repudiated by the Government and its conservative advisers.

But a time came when its lessons had to be unlearned. In the school of trial it was forced to admit that war does not mean peace, but exactly the opposite of peace. Slowly, and step by step, it yielded up its theories, and brought itself face to face with the stern facts of the crisis. The Government no longer gets frightened at the word subjugate, because of its literal etymology, but is manfully and successfully endeavoring to place the yoke of the Constitution upon the unbaptized necks of the scoundrels who have thrown it off. The war is now recognized as a struggle of numbers, of desperate physical violence, to be fought out to the bitter end, without stopping to count its cost in money or in blood. Both the people and our armies, under this new dispensation, have been learning how to hate rebels as Christian patriots ought to have done from the beginning. They have been learning how to hate rebel sympathizers also, and to brand them as even meaner than rebels outright. They regard the open-throated traitor, who stakes his life, his property, his all, upon the success of his conspiracy against the Constitution and the rights of man, as a more tolerable character than the skulking miscreant who in his heart wishes the rebellion God-speed while masquerading in the hypocritical disguise of loyalty. Had the Government been animated by a like spirit at the beginning of the outbreak, practically accepting the truth that there can be no middle ground between treason and loyalty, rebel sympathizers would have given the country far less trouble than they have done. A little wholesome severity, summarily administered, would have been a most sovereign panacea. On this point the people were in advance of the Administration, and they are to-day. Their earnestness has not yet found a complete and authoritative expression in the action of the Government. A system of retaliation, which would have proved a measure of real mercy, has not yet been adopted. Our cause is not wholly rescued from the control of conservative politicians and generals. Much remains to be done; but far more, certainly, has already been accomplished. The times of brotherly love toward rebels in arms have gone by forever. Such men as McClellan, Buell, and Fitz John Porter, are generally out of the way, and men who believe in fighting rebels are in active command. This revolution in the war policy of the Government, as already observed, was absolutely necessary to the salvation of our cause; and the country will not soon forget those earnest men who at first comprehended the crisis and the duty, and persistently urged a vigorous policy, suited to remorseless and revolutionary violence, till the Government felt constrained to embrace it.

But a vigorous prosecution of the war, Mr. Chairman, was not enough. While this struggle is one of numbers and of violence, it is likewise, and still more emphatically, a war of ideas; a conflict between two forms of civilization, each wrestling for the mastery of the country. No one now pretends to dispute this, nor is it easy to understand how any one could ever have failed to perceive it. But the Government, in the beginning, did not believe it. It tried, with all its might, not to believe it, and to persuade the world to disbelieve it. It insisted that the real cause of the war did not cause it at all. The rebellion was the work of chance; a stupendous accident, leaping into life full-grown, without father or mother, without any discoverable genesis. It was a huge, black, portentous, national riot, which must be suppressed, but nobody was to be allowed to say one word about the causes which produced it, or the issues involved in the struggle. Silence was to be our supreme wisdom. Hence it was that the Government, speaking through its high functionaries, declared that the slavery question was not involved in the quarrel, and that every slave in bondage would remain in exactly the same condition after the war as before. Hence it was that when a celebrated proclamation was issued, giving freedom to the slaves of rebels in Missouri, it was revoked by the Government in order to please the State of Kentucky, and placate the power that began the war. Hence, under General Halleck's "Order No. 3," which remained in force more than a year, the swarms of contrabands who came thronging to our lines, tendering us the use of their muscles and the secrets of the rebel prison-house, were driven away by our commanders. Hence it was that our soldiers were compelled to serve as slave-hounds in chasing down fugitives and sending them back to rebel masters, and that General McClellan, who always loved slavery more than he loved his country, and who declared he would put down slave insurrections "with an iron hand," was continued as commander-in-chief of our armies long months after the country desired to spew him out. Hence, likewise, so many thousands of our soldiers were compelled to dig and ditch in the swamps of the Chickahominy till the cold sweat of death gathered on the handle of the spade, while swarms of stalwart negroes, able to relieve them and eager to do so, were denied the privilege, lest it should offend the nostrils of Democratic gentility, and give aid and comfort to the Abolitionists. Hence it was that the President, instead of striking at slavery as a military necessity, and while rebuking that policy in his dealings with Hunter and Fremont, was at the same time so earnestly espousing chimerical projects for the colonization of negroes, coupled with the policy of gradual and compensated emancipation, which should take place some time before the year 1900, if the slaveholders should be willing. Hence it was that very soon after the Administration had been installed in power it began to lose sight of the principles on which it had triumphed in 1860, allowing four fifths of the offices of the Army and Navy to be held by men of known hostility to those principles, while the various Departments of the Government in this city were largely filled by rebel sympathizers. Hence it was that for nearly two years of this war the Government, while smiting the rebels with one hand and with the other guarding the slave property and protecting the constitutional rights of the men who had renounced the Constitution, and ceased to have any rights under it save the right to its penalty against traitors. Hence it was that during the greater part of this time the Administration stood upon the platform and urged the policy of "the Constitution as it is, and the Union as it was," which the nation so overwhelmingly repudiated in the late presidential contest. Hence it was, finally, that the songs of Whittier could not be sung in our armies, that slavery was everywhere dealt with by the Government as the dear child of its love, and that our rulers seemed, with matchless impiety, to hope for the favor of God without laying hold of the conscience of our quarrel, and by coolly kicking it out of doors! Sir, I believe it safe to say that this madness cost the nation the precious sacrifice of fifty thousand soldiers, who have gone up to the throne of God as witnesses against the horrid infatuation that so long shaped the policy of the Government in resisting this slaveholders' rebellion.

But here, again, Mr. Chairman, the Government had to unlearn its first lessons. Its purpose to crush the rebellion and spare slavery was found to be utterly suicidal to our cause. It was a purpose to accomplish a moral impossibility, and was therefore prosecuted, if not conceived, in the interest of the rebels. It was an attempt to marry treason and loyalty; for the rebellion is slavery, armed with the powers of war, organized for wholesale schemes of aggression, and animated by the overflowing fullness of its infernal genius. The strength of our cause lies in its righteousness, and therefore no bargain with the devil could possibly give it aid. Through great suffering and sacrifice, individual and national, our rulers learned that there is but "one strong thing here below, the just thing, the true thing," and that God would not allow these several States to be reunited without the abandonment, forever, of our great national sin. This was a difficult lesson, but as it was gradually mastered the Government "changed its base." It became disenchanted. Congress took the lead in ushering in the new dispensation. A new article of war was enacted, forbidding our armies from returning fugitive slaves. Slavery was abolished in the District of Columbia, and prohibited in our national Territories, where it had been planted by the dogma of popular sovereignty and the Dred Scott decision. Our Federal judiciary was so reorganized as to make sure this anti-slavery legislation of Congress. The confiscation of slaves was provided for, and freedom offered to all who would come over and help us, either as laborers or soldiers, thus annulling the famous and infamous order of General Halleck, already referred to. The fugitive slave law was at first made void as to the slaves of rebels, and finally repealed altogether, with the old law of 1793. The coastwise slave trade, a frightful system of home piracy, carried on by authority of Congress since the year 1807, was totally abolished. The right of testimony in our Federal courts, and to sue and be sued, was conferred upon negroes. Their employment as soldiers was at last systematically provided for, and their pay at length made the same as that of white soldiers. The independence of Hayti and Liberia was recognized, and new measures taken to put an end to the African slave trade. In thus wiping out our code of national slave laws, acknowledging the manhood of the negro, and recognizing slavery as the enemy of our peace, Congress emphatically rebuked the policy which had sought to ignore it, and to shield it from the destructive hand of the war instigated by itself; while it opened the way for further and inevitable measures of justice looking to his complete emancipation from the dominion of Anglo-Saxon prejudice, the repeal of all special legislation intended for his injury, and his absolute restoration to equal rights with the white man as a citizen as well as a soldier.

Meanwhile, the President had been giving the subject his sober second thought, and reconsidering his position at the beginning of the conflict. Instead of affirming, as at first, that the question of slavery was not involved in the struggle, he gradually perceived and finally admitted that it was at once the cause of the war and the obstacle to peace. Instead of resolving to save the Union with slavery, he finally resolved to save the Union without it, and by its destruction. Instead of entertaining the country with projects of gradual and distant emancipation, conditioned upon compensation to the master and the colonization of the freedmen, he himself finally launched the policy of immediate and unconditional liberation. Instead of recoiling from "radical and extreme measures," and "a remorseless revolutionary conflict," he at last marched up to the full height of the national emergency, and proclaimed "to all whom it may concern" that slavery must perish. Instead of a constitutional amendment for the purpose of eternizing the institution in the Republic, indorsed by him in his inaugural message, he became the zealous advocate of a constitutional amendment abolishing it forever. Instead of committing the fortunes of the war to pro-slavery commanders, whose hearts were not in the work, he learned how to dispense with their services, and find the proper substitutes. These forward movements were not ventured upon hastily, but after much hesitation and apparent reluctance. Not suddenly, but following great deliberation and many misgivings, he issued his proclamation of freedom. Months afterward he doubted its wisdom; but it was a grand step forward, which at once severed his relations with his old conservative friends, and linked his fortunes thenceforward to those of the men of ideas and of progress. Going hand in hand with Congress in the great advance measures referred to, or acquiescing in their adoption, the whole policy of the Administration has been revolutionized. Abolitionism and loyalty are now accepted as convertible terms, and so are treason and slavery. Our covenant with death is annulled. Our national partnership with Satan has been dissolved; and just in proportion as this has been done, and an alliance sought with divine Providence, has the cause of our country prospered. In a word, Radicalism has saved our nation from the political damnation and ruin to which Conservatism would certainly have consigned it; while the mistakes and failures of the Administration stand confessed in its new policy, which alone can vindicate its wisdom, command the respect and gratitude of the people, and save it from humiliation and disgrace.

Mr. Chairman, these lessons of the past suggest the true moral of this great conflict, and make the way of the future plain. They demand a vigorous prosecution of the war by all the powers of war, and that the last vestige of slavery shall be scourged out of life. Let the Administration falter on either of these points and the people will disown its policy. They have not chosen the President for another term through any secondary or merely personal considerations. In the presence of so grand an issue, men were nothing. They had no faith in General McClellan and the party leaders at his heels. They had little faith in the early policy of Mr. Lincoln, when Democratic ideas ruled this Administration and the power of slavery held him in its grasp. Had his appeal to the people been made two years earlier, he would have been as overwhelmingly repudiated as he has been gloriously indorsed. The people sustain him now because of their assured faith that he will not hesitate to execute their will. In voting for him for a second term, they voted for liberating and arming the slaves of the South to crush out a slaveholders' rebellion. They voted that the Republic shall live, and that whatever is necessary to save its life shall be done. They voted that slavery shall be eternally doomed, and future rebellions thus made impossible. They voted, not that Abraham Lincoln can save the country, but that they can save it, with him as their servant. That is what was decided in the late elections. I have participated, somewhat actively, in seven presidential contests, and I remember none in which the element of personal enthusiasm had a smaller share than that of last November. One grand and overmastering resolve filled the hearts and swayed the purposes of the masses everywhere, and that was the rescue of the country through the defeat of the Chicago platform and conspirators. In the execution of that resolve they lost sight of everything else; but should the President now place himself in the people's way, by reviving the old policy of tenderness to the rebels and their beloved institution, the loyal men of the country will abandon his policy as decidedly as they have supported it generously. They have not approved the mistakes either of the legislative or executive department of the Government. They expect that Congress will pass a bill for the confiscation of the fee of rebel landholders, and they expect the President will approve it. They expect that Congress will provide for the reconstruction of the rebel States by systematic legislation, which shall guaranty republican governments to each of those States, and the complete enfranchisement of the negro; and they will not approve, as they have not approved, of any executive interference with the people's will as deliberately expressed by Congress. They expect that Congress will provide for parceling out the forfeited and confiscated lands of rebels in small homesteads among the soldiers and seamen of the war, as a fit reward for their valor and a security against the ruinous monopoly of the soil in the South; and they will be disappointed should this great measure fail through the default either of Congress or the Executive. They demand a system of just retaliation against the rebels for outrages committed upon our prisoners; that a policy of increasing earnestness and vigor shall prevail till the war shall be ended; and that no hope of peace shall be whispered, save on condition of an absolute and unconditional surrender to our authority; and the Government will only prolong the war by standing in the way of these demands. This is emphatically the people's war; and it will not any longer suffice to say that the people are not ready for all necessary measures of success. The people would have been ready for such measures from the beginning, if the Government had led the way. At every stage of the contest they have hailed with joy every earnest man who came forward, and every vigorous war measure that has been proposed. So long as the war was conducted under the counsels of conservatives, and in the interests of slavery, the people clamored against the Administration; but just so soon as the Government entered upon a vigorous policy, and proclaimed war against slavery, the people began to shout for the Union and liberty. In the fall of 1862, before the Administration was divorced from its early policy, the Union party was overwhelmed at the polls. But we triumphed the next year, and gloriously triumphed last year, because the Government yielded to the popular demand. The plea often urged, that the people were not ready, is less a fact than a pretext. The men who loved slavery more than they loved the Union were never ready for radical measures. They are not ready to-day. On the other hand, the men who were all the while unconditionally for the Union would have sustained the Administration far more heartily in the most thorough and sweeping war measures, than they sustained its policy of delaying those measures to the last hour.

The truth is, the people have stood by the Government for the sake of the cause, whether its policy pleased them or not. Their faith and patience have been singularly unflinching throughout the entire struggle. They would not distrust the President without the strongest reasons. They were ever ready to credit him with good intentions, and to presume in favor of his superior means of knowledge. When General Frémont was recalled from Missouri, and General Butler from New Orleans, the people pocketed their deep disappointment and quietly acquiesced. When General Buell was kept in command so long after his inefficiency had been demonstrated and his loyalty questioned, both by the country and the men under his command, the people bore it with uncommon patience and long-suffering. They displayed the same virtues in the case of General McClellan, and other rebel sympathizers, who found favor with the Administration long after the country would have sent them adrift. Sir, this feeling of unconquerable respect for our chosen rulers, this Anglo-Saxon regard for constituted authority, has been evinced by the people through all the phases of the war. Most assuredly it would not have been found wanting had the Government inaugurated a radical policy, instead of a conservative one, during the first year and a half of the struggle. The people who endured McClellan, and Buell, and Halleck, would have endured Frémont, and Hunter, and Butler. If the conservative Unionists of Kentucky were not ready for the proclamation of freedom to the slaves of Missouri rebels, there were millions of people outside of Kentucky who were not ready to have it revoked. I agree that slavery had done much to drug the conscience of the country with its insidious poison. I know that we had so long made our bed with slaveholders that kicking them out was rather an awkward business. As brethren, living under a common Government, we had long journeyed together, and our habits and traditions naturally took the form of obstacles to a just policy in dealing with them as rebels and public enemies. It was by no means easy at once to recognize them as such. All this is granted, and that in the beginning the country was not prepared for every radical measure of legislation and war now being employed by the Government. But it was the duty of the Administration to do its part in preparing the country. Clothed with solemn official authority, and intrusted by the nation with the sworn duty of serving it in such a crisis, it had no right to become the foot-ball of events. It had no right, at such a time, to make itself a negative expression, or an unknown quantity, in the algebra which was to work out the grand problem. It had no right to take shelter beneath a debauched and sickly public sentiment, and plead it in bar of the great duty imposed upon it by the crisis. It had no right, certainly, to lag behind that sentiment, to magnify its extent and potency, and to become its virtual ally, instead of endeavoring to control it, and to indoctrinate the country with ideas suited to the emergency. The power of the Government in molding the general opinion and feeling was immense, and its responsibility must be measured accordingly. The revocation of the first anti-slavery proclamation of this war chilled the heart of every earnest loyalist in the land, and came like a trumpet-call to the pro-slavery hosts to rally and stand together. They obeyed it, and from that event dates the birth of organized Copperhead Democracy. The rebels of the South and their sympathizers in the North felt that they had gained an ally in the President. Had he sustained that measure, would not its moral effect have been at least as potent on the other side? Had his official name and sanction been as often given to the cause of radicalism as they were lent to that of pro-slavery conservatism would not the country have been much sooner prepared for the saving and only policy? If he had said, early in the struggle, "to all whom it may concern," what he says now, that slavery is the nation's enemy, and therefore must be destroyed, instead of sheltering it under the Constitution and sparing it from the hand of war, how grandly could he have "organized victory" and multiplied himself among the people! Sir, our traditional respect for slavery and slaveholders was our grand peril. It stood up as an impassable barrier in the way of any successful war for the Union. So long as it was allowed to dominate, it unnerved the arm of the Government and deadened the spirit of the people. It made the Old World our enemy, and threatened us with foreign war. The mission of the Government was not to make this feeling stronger by deferring to it, or to doom the country to a prolonged war and deplorable sacrifices as the best means of teaching the people the truth. No. The country needed a speedy exodus from the bondage of false ideas, and the Government should have pointed the way. A frank statement by it of the real issue of the war, without any disposition to cover up the truth; an unmistakable hostility to slavery as the organized curse, without which the rebellion would have been impossible; and the timely utterance in its leading State papers of a few bold and spirit-stirring words which might have been "half battles," appealing to the courage and manhood of the nation, would have gone far to educate the judgment and conscience of the people, and command their enthusiastic espousal of whatever measures would promise most speedily to end the struggle and economize its cost in property and life.

Mr. Chairman, I take no pleasure, certainly, in thus freely discussing the policy of the Government in its endeavors to meet its great responsibilities during this war. I have only referred to its mistakes as a servant of the truth, and in the name of the great cause which has been made to suffer. I believe, religiously, in the freedom of speech. From the beginning of the war I have exercised the right of frank, friendly, and fearless criticism of the conduct of our rulers, wherever I believed them to have been in the wrong. I shall continue to exercise it to the end; and if I should not, through any personal or prudential considerations, I would be unworthy of the seat I have occupied on this floor. Criticism has dictated the present policy of the Government, and is still a duty. This great battle for the rights of man, and the actors in it, must be judged. None of them can "escape history." The fame of none of them is so precious as the truth, and as public justice, which cares for the dead as well as the living, for the common soldiers slain by thousands, as well as for the general and the statesman. The President, his advisers, his commanding generals, and the civilians whose shaping hands have had so much to do with the conduct of the war, must all of them be weighed in the balance by the people and the generations to come. "The great soul of the world is just," and sooner or later all disguises will be thrown off, and every historical character will stand forth as he is, in the light of his deeds and deserts. The men who have been intrusted with the concerns of the nation in this momentous crisis will not be judged harshly. Much will be forgiven or excused on the score of the surpassing magnitude and difficulty of their work. Justice will be done; but that justice may brand as a crime, the blunders proceeding from a feeble, timid, ambidextrous policy, resulting in great sacrifices of life and treasure, and periling the priceless interests at stake. I would award all due honor to this Administration, and to the statesmen and generals who have been faithful to their high trusts; but I would award an equal honor to the rank and file of the people, who have inspired its present policy, and to the rank and file of our soldiers, who have saved the country in spite of the mistakes of the Government, the strifes of our politicians, and the rivalries of our generals. These are the real heroes of the war. Untitled, practically unrewarded, facing every form of privation and danger, and animated by the purest patriotism, the common soldier is not only the true hero of the war, but the real saviour of his country.

But a higher honor, if not a more enduring fame, will be the heritage of the anti-slavery pioneers and prophets of our land; for

"Peace hath higher tests of manhood Than battle ever knew."

Without their heroic labors and sacrifices the Republic, "heir of all the ages," would have been the mightiest slave empire of the world. In an age of practical atheism and mammon-worship, when the Church and the State joined hands with Slavery as the new trinity of the nation's faith, they really believed in God, in justice, in the resistless might of the truth. They believed that liberty is the birthright of all men, and their grand mission was the practical vindication of this truth. They believed, with their whole hearts, in the Declaration of Independence. They accepted its teachings as coincident with the gospel of Christ, and supported by reason and justice. It was their ceaseless "battle-cry of freedom," and they chanted it as "the fresh, the matin song of the universe," to the enslaved of all races and lands. They were branded as fanatics and infidels, and encountered everywhere the hootings of the multitude and the scorn of politicians and priests; but I know of no class of men who were ever more far-sighted, whose convictions rested on so broad a basis of Christian morals and logic, and whose religious trust was so strong and so steadfast. For them there was no "eclipse of faith." Just as the nation began to lapse from the grand ideas of our revolutionary era, they began to "cry aloud and spare not," and they never ceased or slackened their labors. Placing their ears to the ground in the infancy and weakness of their movement, they caught the rumbling thunders of civil war in the distance, warned the country of its danger, and preached repentance as the chosen and only means of escape. They were compelled to face mobs, violence, persecution, and death, and were always misunderstood or misrepresented; but they never faltered. Reputation, honors, property, worldly ease, were all freely laid upon the altar of duty, in their resolve to vindicate the rights of man and the freedom of speech. To follow these apostles and martyrs was to forsake all the prizes of life which worldly prudence or ambition could value or covet. It was to take up the heaviest cross yet fashioned by this century as the test of Christian character and heroism; and those who bore it were far braver spirits than the men who fight our battles on land and sea.

Mr. Chairman, the failure of men thus devoted to a great and holy cause was morally impossible. They could not fail. Through their courage, constancy, and faith, they gradually received the cooperation or sympathy of the better type of men of all parties and creeds. They seriously disturbed, or broke in pieces, the great political and ecclesiastical organizations of the land; and even before this war their ideas were rapidly taking captive the popular heart. When it came, they saw, as by intuition, the character of the struggle, as the final phase of slaveholding madness and crime, and insisted upon the early adoption of that radical policy which the Government at last was compelled to accept. I believe it safe to say that the moral appeals and persistent criticism of these men, and of the far greater numbers who borrowed or sympathized with their views, saved our cause from the complete control of conservatism, and thus saved the country itself from destruction. Going at once to the heart of our great conflict, they pointed out the only remedy, and felt compelled to reprobate the failure of the Government to adopt it. They judged its policy in war, as they had done in peace, in the light of its fidelity or infidelity to human rights. By this test they tried every man and party, and they need ask for no other rule of judgment for themselves. The Administration, and the chief actors in this drama of war, of whatever political school, must be weighed in the same great balance. Not even the founders of the Republic will be spared from the trial. In their compromise with slavery in the beginning, which is now seen to have been the germ of this horrid conflict, they "swerved from the right." Posterity must so pronounce; and the record which dims the luster of their great names will be read in the flames of this war as a warning against all future compacts with evil. Justice to public men is as certain as that truth is omnipotent. It may be delayed for a season; it may be hidden from the vision of men of little faith; but its final triumph is sure. To the world's true heroes and confessors history ever sends its word of cheer:

"The good can well afford to wait;
Give ermined knaves their hour of crime;
Ye have the future, grand and great,
The safe appeal of truth to time."

RECONSTRUCTION—TRIUMPH OF LIBERTY.

SPEECH OF HON. I. N. ARNOLD, OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1865.

The House having under consideration the special order, being the reconstruction bill—

Mr. ARNOLD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The end of the struggle between liberty and slavery, on battle-field and in Congress, draws near. The final, crowning triumph of freedom in eradicating slavery from the Republic, to be consummated by the adoption of the constitutional amendment submitted to the States by Congress, approaches. It seems a fit occasion to pause in the midst of the great drama and look back over the history of this struggle and recall the leading events which have marked its progress.

From this Thirty-Eighth Congress, henceforward, our country will be recognized throughout the world as a free country. The reproach of slavery has at length been removed from our national fame. We are on the threshold of a new era. A destiny now dawns before us of a vast continental republic based on the grand idea of human liberty, recognizing God as the common Father, and the universal brotherhood of man.

It is historically demonstrable that the framers of the Constitution in organizing the Government tolerated the existence of slavery as a temporary evil which they believed was in the course of ultimate extinction. They never intended it should be extended beyond the limits of the States in which it then existed. Hence its prohibition in the Northwest by the Ordinance of 1787, and the provision for the abolition of the slave trade. They believed that the moral influences and economical considerations which had caused its extinction in most of the old thirteen States would ultimately produce the same result in all. Hence not only the prohibition in the ordinance of freedom for the territory north and west of the Ohio, but the constitutional provision prohibiting the slave trade. The founders of the Government having, by the Declaration of Independence, made the equality of all men before the law the cornerstone of their structure, relied upon moral, legal, and constitutional means to effect the removal of the anomaly, slavery. They believed that public opinion expressing itself through the press, on the stump, in every form of discussion, and rendering its final verdict through the ballot, would consummate universal liberty throughout the land "to all the inhabitants thereof."

These agencies would doubtless have produced the result anticipated but for the introduction of new and unexpected elements. The invention of the cotton-gin, the vast accession of rich and virgin territory by the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida, adapted to the growth of cotton and negro labor, and the immediate and marvelous profits of cotton-growing, gave a power to slavery never before realized. There immediately arose a gigantic pecuniary interest which found its gains through slavery. The slaveholders, relatively few in numbers, soon united and became a compact, active, determined power. They became skillful politicians; and the free States, absorbed in great material interests, in the absorbing task of subduing and reclaiming a continent, in constructing cities, canals, and railways, and unsuspicious of danger, were easily divided and ruled by the adroit politicians of the slave States. These seized and held the political power of the Union, and controlled the Federal Government in the interests of their peculiar institution. They possessed a great advantage in the clause of the Constitution giving them the right of representing three fifths of their slaves in Congress and in the Electoral College; so that one slaveholder owning five thousand slaves had a power equal to that of three thousand freemen; practically far greater, because his power was always a unit, while the freemen were always more or less divided. This created substantially a powerful caste or order of nobility in the slave States. The intellect of the South was absorbed in politics, while in the free States it was inventing the cotton-gin, the steam engine, the telegraph, opening the canals, constructing ships, and rivaling the world in commerce and manufactures, and contending successfully with Europe in art, in literature, and in science. Thus the slaveholders, watchful, sagacious, grasping power, strengthening their influence by every possible means, seized upon and held the reins of Government. They stealthily strengthened its influence in Federal courts until its power was absolute on the bench of the Supreme Court, and that once august tribunal, at their dictation, rendered the infamous Dred Scott decision. Slavery was absolute in the Halls of Congress. It controlled the Army and the Navy, with West Point and the Naval School as its nurseries. It dictated presidential candidates for both the great parties which divided the people.

But this supremacy of the aristocratic slavery party was not accomplished without resistance. To the thoughtful observer the conflict between a democracy like the people of the North, and a ruling class with power based on slavery, such as existed in the slave States, was early seen to be "irrepressible." The philosophic statesman hoped the conflict would be peaceful, and would be settled by peaceful agencies.

THE "IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT."

The earliest important exhibition of this "irrepressible conflict," after the adoption of the Constitution, was on the admission of Missouri as a slave State. Slavery triumphed then by a compromise, securing the admission of Missouri as a slave State, with the prohibition of slavery north of latitude 36° 30'.

One of the most instructive chapters in history is the struggle between liberty and slavery in the United States from 1820 to 1860. Slavery, not content with the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida, annexed Texas and brought on the war with Mexico; but while ever ready to buy or annex slave territory, the votes of the slave States were nearly solid against the acquisition of territory with the Wilmot proviso, prohibiting slavery, attached.

From the Missouri question down to 1860, the antagonism was always felt, not always visible, and yet it controlled the secret movements of parties. The encroachments of the slaveholders and the subserviency to the slaveholding interest of the two great Whig and Democratic parties led gradually to the formation of what was called a Liberty party.

THE LIBERTY PARTY.

This organization, full of fiery zeal and talent, placed itself in direct antagonism to the gigantic power of slavery. When it was first organized the slave power had control of existing parties, and to a very great extent of the churches, of the press, and all the great organizations which mold public sentiment and action. The slaveholder held the purse and the sword. Its devotees held the offices from President down to tide-waiter. No man was permitted to represent the nation abroad whose fealty to slavery was doubted. Every new Territory was filled with the instruments of the slave power, so as to train it up and introduce it into the Union as an ally of the oligarchy. Meanwhile slavery had revolutionized the Government. The great principles of Magna Charta and the Declaration of Independence had ceased to have practical existence in the slave States. Liberty of speech and freedom of the press, so far as slavery was concerned, had been suppressed by violence. Indeed, serious attempts had been made by mobs to stifle it in the North. An anti-slavery man, or abolitionist, in the slave States could obtain no redress for any outrage. The Bowie-knife, the bludgeon, and the halter, were the instruments of violence and outrage to stifle and crush all who questioned the rightfulness of slavery. The slave power had thus subverted in the slave States the Constitution, and established a despotism on its ruins. It had accomplished substantially a revolution. Failing, after a long struggle, to suppress the right of petition and freedom of speech in Congress, it introduced the bludgeon, the appropriate weapon of the vulgar, gross, licentious, boasting aristocracy, into the Senate of the United States, and struck down a Senator for words spoken in debate.

The Liberty party, the seeds of which had been scattered by the writings of the fathers of the revolutionary period, its growth nurtured by the blood of martyrs to free speech and a free press, its early ranks illustrated by Jay, Channing, Garrison, Phillips, Leggett, and many others, which embodied more of talent, genius, and eloquence than any party of the same numbers, rapidly grew in power and influence, so that in 1848 it began to influence presidential elections. The Whig party having nominated General Zachary Taylor for President, and the Democratic party General Lewis Cass, and both parties refusing to take position against the extension of slavery, the Liberty party, combining with the earnest anti-slavery men of both parties, met at Buffalo, in 1848, and nominated Martin Van Buren for President and Charles F. Adams for Vice President.

THE FREE-SOIL PARTY.

The distinctive principle of this organization was hostility to the extension of slavery. It declared that Congress had no power to interfere with slavery in the States, but that Congress had the constitutional power to prohibit slavery in the Territories, and ought to exercise it. The leaders of this organization embodied ardent, enthusiastic Democrats, and liberty-loving Whigs filled with zeal against slavery, and they conducted the canvass against the two old parties with a degree of eloquence, ability, and energy scarcely paralleled in our history. It was the poetry of politics and the religion of patriotism. John Van Buren brought into this canvass of 1848 a fiery eloquence, wit, sarcasm, which gave him a world-wide reputation. John P. Hale, Charles Sumner, Henry Wilson, Salmon P. Chase, Cassius M. Clay, and many others scarcely less distinguished, were among the prominent and ardent leaders in this contest. Although the ticket carried no electoral votes, it received a very large popular support in New England, New York, Ohio, and northern Illinois.

The Whigs, in 1852, nominated General Scott for President. The convention resolved to uphold the so-called compromise measures of 1850. The Democratic convention nominated Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, and W. R. King, of Alabama. This convention also resolved to adhere to the compromise acts of 1850, and to discountenance any interference by Congress with slavery. The free Democratic convention met at Pittsburg and nominated John P. Hale for President and George W. Julian for Vice President. This convention emphasized its opposition to slavery by declaring:

"That to the persevering and importunate clamor of the slave power for more slave States, new slave Territories, and the nationalization of slavery, our distinct and final answer is, no more slave States, no slave Territory, no nationalized slavery, and no national legislation for the extradition of slaves.

"That slavery is a sin against God and a crime against man, which no human enactment nor usage can make right, and that Christianity, humanity, and patriotism alike demand its abolition.

"That we inscribe on our banner free soil, free speech, free labor, and free men, and under it will fight on and fight ever until victory shall reward our exertion."

This party so organized on the principle of hostility to slavery did not receive as large a vote as in 1848, but became consolidated, and through the press, and by lectures and speeches on the stump, was creating, organizing, and deepening the public sentiment against slavery. But the party was immensely strengthened by two events, to which the early success of the Republican or anti-slavery party is to be attributed. I refer to the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and the attempt to force slavery upon the Territory of Kansas by fraud and violence.

REPEAL OF MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

The struggle in Congress upon the bill to repeal the Missouri compromise and organize the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska north of the line in which slavery had been prohibited was vigorous and determined. Its repeal shocked the moral sense of the free States, and it was regarded not only as a humiliation of the North, but as violation of faith. It was openly announced on the floor of the Senate that the passage of the bill annihilated all compromise, past or future, and brought liberty and slavery face to face in a grapple for life. Senators announced the end of the despotism of slavery, and that freedom should be established everywhere beyond the limits of the States. The first struggle came on in Kansas. On the one side were fraud, violence, the border ruffians of Missouri, under the lead of Atchison, Stringfellow, and others, against the New England Puritan, reinforced by arms made strong by free labor, Sharp's rifles, John Brown, and Henry Ward Beecher.

The story of this struggle in Kansas between fraud, violence, and outrage on one side, and heroic firmness, energy, and determination on the other, has not faded from the memory of the people. The plains of Kansas, red with the blood of her martyrs to liberty, her valleys yet black with the cinders of her burned and devastated towns, villages, and cabins, attest alike the devotion of her people to liberty and the savage barbarity of the slaveholder. All honor to Kansas! She was the rock which stemmed the tide of the slave conspirators. She successfully withstood the slave power backed by the Federal Government.

But the struggle in Kansas resulted not only in the triumph of liberty then but in rousing everywhere the people of the North to resist the encroachments of slavery.

CONTEST OF 1856.

Animated with the consciousness of a great cause, ennobled by the advocacy of great principles and a generous love of liberty, feeling the sublimity of the contest, flushed with success in thus far thwarting the triumph of slavery in Kansas, the Republican convention met in June, 1856, and nominated John C. Frémont for President and William L. Dayton for Vice President. Its members were ardent, and hopeful of success.

Its distinctive principle was hostility to the extension of slavery.

The Democratic party nominated James Buchanan for President and John C. Breckinridge for Vice President.

The party calling itself American organized with Millard Fillmore as its presidential candidate and Andrew J. Donelson for Vice President. The national convention which nominated this ticket laid upon the table a resolution that no man should be nominated who was not in favor of interdicting slavery north of 36° 30' by act of Congress. The election was earnestly contested, and was very close, Pennsylvania, at the October State election, virtually deciding the contest by giving the small majority of four hundred for the Democratic State ticket. Buchanan received one hundred and seventy-two electoral votes, Frémont one hundred and fourteen, and Fillmore the vote of Maryland. There were during this canvass many threats uttered by prominent men of the South, that in case Frémont was elected the slave States would secede. Little regard was paid to this; it was generally considered idle gasconade. The struggle between freedom and slavery still continued. The slaveholders, flushed with triumph in the election of Buchanan, were confident of success. The Supreme Court, a few days after Buchanan's inauguration, announced their decision in the Dred Scott case, holding that the Missouri compromise was unconstitutional; that the Constitution itself carried slavery into all the Territories, and that the negro Dred Scott, although voluntarily carried into the Territory over which and while the prohibition of slavery was on the statute-book, was nevertheless a slave.

The friends of freedom, so far from being discouraged by this decision, only nerved themselves for still greater efforts. The contest of 1856 being over, they did not ground their arms, but immediately began the canvass for 1860.

In November, 1857, the Lecompton constitution was adopted in Kansas by a convention elected by the most outrageous frauds and shameless violence.

HONEST OLD ABE.

In June, 1858, there came prominently before the country an actor, who, hitherto comparatively obscure, was soon to become the most prominent figure in American history. Abraham Lincoln was a plain, rough, sturdy pioneer of the West. Self-made and self-educated, a giant in frame, ungraceful and awkward in person, but kind and genial in disposition; a profound thinker, taking nothing on the opinions of others, but reasoning out his own convictions and conclusions; of great sagacity, of unblemished private character, of a truthfulness, and honesty which had long established for him among the backwoodsmen, dressed in buckskin and Kentucky jeans, the familiar soubriquet of "Honest Old Abe."

This man, whose sympathies were with the people, who loved liberty and detested slavery, called sneeringly by the aristocrats one of the "poor white trash" of the South, now threw all his energies into the contest and soon became the leader of the friends of liberty. His language possessed a plainness, quaintness, and clearness of illustration, and a rugged, Anglo-Saxon style, wonderfully adapted to reach the sense and understanding of the common mind of the country. The training of this man for the great part he was to act in the drama of history was not in the schools. Perhaps it was better: from childhood he had been accustomed to struggle with and overcome difficulties. With the basis of perfect truth, candor, integrity, modesty, and sobriety, he acquired self-control, self-reliance, and the ability to use promptly a clear judgment and sound common sense.

His acquisitions in general knowledge and information were rarely surpassed. He studied and investigated every subject that required his action. He was a good lawyer, a good mechanic, a good farmer, and had a fund of practical information upon almost every subject. He studied Euclid and Shakespeare as well as Blackstone while traveling the circuit. He had served a single term in Congress, but his education, his preparation, was among the people in humble positions. He had seen life in various phases. He had been a flat-boatman, a rail-splitter, a surveyor, a private soldier in a campaign against the Indians, a member of the Legislature of Illinois, and a very successful lawyer on the circuit among the log court-houses of the West. He had the advantage of competing at a bar where very able men were his competitors and rivals, and he always held a front rank. As I have said on a different occasion, there gathered, some twenty-five years ago, around the plain pine tables of the rude court-houses of central Illinois a very remarkable combination of men. Among them Abraham Lincoln, Stephen A. Douglas, Lyman Trumbull, O. H. Brown- ing, E. D. Baker, late the able and eloquent Senator from Oregon, the martyr of Ball's Bluff; General James Shields, long Senator, who won a high reputation on the battle-fields of Mexico; General John J. Hardin, who fell on the bloody field of Buena Vista; James A. McDougall, Senator from California; Governor Bissell, one of the ablest statesmen of Illinois, and the eloquent Representative whose defense of the gallant soldiers of that State drew a challenge from Jefferson Davis, then a member of Congress from Mississippi, which was accepted by Bissell, but the Mississippian did not fight, withdrawing his challenge under the influence of General Taylor.

These, and many others equally able, were the men with whom Lincoln in his career at the bar was called to compete.

LINCOLN AND DOUGLAS.

But the man to whom Lincoln was most indebted for his training and his fame was his great political rival, Stephen A. Douglas. These men, both self-made and self-educated, coming in early manhood to Illinois, soon became the leaders, each of his party. No two men were more unlike. Physically and mentally they were contrasts. Lincoln was the giant, Douglas was the "little giant." Small in person, a giant in intellect, Douglas was bold, denunciatory, impetuous, ardent, determined. He had the qualities which create personal popularity, and he was ever the idol of his party. His iron will, indomitable energy, full faith in himself and in his cause, united with frank and magnetic manners, and a generous heart, made him one of the strongest men in the nation. These two men were members of the Legislature of Illinois as early as 1836. Douglas had distinguished himself as an able debater and controversialist in Illinois, in the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States, on the great question of slavery, and especially of the treatment of this question in the Territories. After voting to apply the Missouri line to Texas, he finally adopted the position of popular sovereignty, or squatter sovereignty as it was called, leaving the people of each Territory to settle the question of slavery for themselves. In accordance with this principle he caused the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and assumed the position that the people of each Territory should themselves choose whether they would exclude or admit slavery. When Buchanan's Administration became a party to the conspiracy to make Kansas a slave State against the will of the people, Douglas adhered to his principle of popular sovereignty, and insisted that the people of Kansas should decide, by a fair vote, the question. This brought him in collision with the extreme men of the slaveholders' party, and they sought to degrade him by removing him from his position of chairman of the Committee on Territories. In July, 1858, the senatorial term of Douglas was about to expire, and he came home to enter upon the canvass for reelection.

In June, 1858, the Republican State convention met at Springfield, Illinois, and nominated Abraham Lincoln for the United States Senate in opposition to Douglas. The speech which Mr. Lincoln made at that convention, brief as it is, is one of the most remarkable in our history. He gave so clear an exposition of the struggle which had long been going on between liberty and slavery that his words immediately seized the attention of the people and became historical. They were recognized as expressing a great philosophic fact, and the man who uttered them, then an obscure lawyer, immediately secured the ear and soon the hearts of the friends of liberty throughout the Union. His speech commencing, "A house divided against itself," &c., is too familiar to need quotation. Of the great conflict between liberty and slavery he said, "We shall not fail; wise counsels may accelerate or mistakes may delay, but sooner or later the victory is sure to come." Such was the grave, philosophic appreciation by Lincoln of the great contest then pending. With this feeling he entered upon the memorable senatorial canvass of 1858 with Senator Douglas. This, whether looking at the persons engaged or the principles involved, was the most remarkable political contest in American history. The two great parties throughout the Union paused to watch its progress, and each observed with eager solicitude every movement of its champion.

Soon after the arrival of Douglas from Washington, in the summer of 1858, Mr. Lincoln challenged him to a series of debates during the campaign. The challenge was accepted. It was arranged that there should be seven joint debates, each alternately opening and closing the discussion; the opening speech to occupy one hour, the reply one hour and a half, and the close half an hour; so that each tournament should be limited to three hours. These debates, held in different sections of the State and in the open air, called together vast throngs of people. They were conducted, with few exceptions, with the dignity and courtesy becoming the occasion. There was every motive to stimulate each champion to the exertion of his utmost power. Each was actuated by sincere convictions that the success of his party was necessary to the safety and prosperity of his country. The Senatorship was the immediate personal prize which would reward the victor, and in the future was the Presidency, probably not overlooked by either, certainly not forgotten by Douglas. The great political questions at issue between the parties were discussed; but each felt, instinctively, that the slavery question was the question of questions. This absorbed all the interest. The question of slavery in the Territories, the Dred Scott decision, the fugitive slave law, and the opinions of the fathers, were among the topics most frequently debated. Douglas went through this campaign with the manner and the bearing of a conquering hero. There was something grand in the boldness with which he threw himself into the contest, and dealt his blows right and left against the great Republican party on one side, and the Administration which sought to aid his defeat on the other. Douglas and his friends were most liberal in their expenditures in this canvass. He had his special trains of cars, a cannon, the firing of which announced his approach, bands of music, his circle of devoted friends traveling with him, and it is said there was expended in the canvass not less than $50,000. Some idea of the plain, simple, frugal habits of Mr. Lincoln may be gathered from a remark made by him after its close, when he said, with the idea apparently that he had been somewhat extravagant, "I do not believe I have spent a cent less than five hundred dollars in this canvass."

Senator Douglas was at that time undoubtedly the leading debater in the United States Senate. For years he had been accustomed to meet the trained leaders of the nation in Congress, and never, either in single combat or receiving the fire of a whole party, had he been discomfited. He was bold, defiant, aggressive, vigorous, fertile in resources, terrible in denunciation, familiar with political history, with practiced readiness in all controversial discussion, of indomitable physical and moral courage, and unquestionably the most formidable man in the nation on the stump. The friends of Lincoln were not without anxiety when the challenge was given, and accepted, for a campaign on the stump. Lincoln was candid, cool, truthful, logical, philosophical; never betrayed into an unfair statement. The criticism upon him as a lawyer was verified and illustrated in these debates: "On the right side of a case Lincoln is an overwhelming giant; on the wrong side his sense of justice and right makes him weak." Douglas's ardor always made him, for the time, believe the side he adopted was right. Lincoln argued the side of freedom with the most profound conviction that its triumph was necessary to the greatness and existence of his country.

It was wonderful how strongly in these discussions, as in all the acts of his public life, he impressed the people with his fairness, honesty, and truthfulness. Every hearer in the vast crowds who thronged to these discussions, whatever his political views, went away with the conviction, "Lincoln believes what he says, he is candid, he would not misstate a fact, or take an unfair advantage to secure a triumph." He had one advantage over Douglas—he was always good-humored; he had always an apt and happy story for illustration; and while Douglas was sometimes irritable, Lincoln never lost his temper. Douglas carried away the most popular applause, but Lincoln made the deeper and more lasting impression. Douglas did not disdain an immediate, an ad captandum triumph, while Lincoln aimed at permanent conviction. Douglas addressed prejudice, and especially the prejudice against the negro, with an adroitness and power never surpassed. Lincoln stated his propositions, and sustained them with the fullest historical knowledge and irresistible logic. Douglas, owing to the favorable apportionment of the Senators and Representatives in the State Legislature, carried a majority and secured the Senatorship, although a majority of the popular vote was recorded against him.

These great debates made Douglas Senator and Lincoln President.

CHICAGO CONVENTION OF 1860.

On the 16th day of May, 1860, the Republican convention met in Chicago to nominate candidates for President and Vice President. An immense building called the Wigwag, capable of holding many thousands of people, had been erected by the Republicans of Chicago. The principal candidates for the nomination for the Presidency were William H. Seward, Simon Cameron, S. P. Chase, and Edward Bates; but it soon became apparent that the contest was between Seward and Lincoln. Mr. Seward had been for many years a leading statesman. He had long been a prominent Senator, and had brought to the discussion of the great issues between freedom and slavery a philosophic mind, broad views, great sagacity, and a devoted love of freedom and humanity. He had been Governor of New York, a leading Senator, and up to that time had occupied a far more conspicuous position before the country than Mr. Lincoln. Hence, he was more in the way of rivals, and was the object of more bitter personal and party hostility of those supporting Cameron, Chase, McLean, and Bates. Mr. Lincoln was the second choice of a greater number than Seward. Hence Mr. Lincoln's nomination was very manifestly probable after the first ballot. On that ballot Mr. Seward received one hundred and seventy-two and a half votes, to one hundred and two for Mr. Lincoln. On the second, Mr. Seward had one hundred and eighty-four to one hundred and eighty-one for Mr. Lincoln. On the third ballot Mr. Lincoln was nominated; his nomination—then made unanimous, and Hannibal Hamlin, nominated for Vice President—was received by thunders of shouts, and the greatest possible enthusiasm prevailed for the "young giant of the West, Abraham Lincoln."

Never did a party enter upon a canvass with more sincere and earnest devotion to principle than this. Love of country and love of liberty pervaded their hearts; a keen sense of the wrongs and outrages committed on the free-State men of Kansas, and the violent, and in many instances savage cruelty by which freedom of speech and liberty of the press had been suppressed in portions of the slave States fired all hearts with enthusiasm and zeal. Confident of success, and determined to leave nothing undone to secure it, the Republican party entered upon the canvass. The great metropolitan press, the New York Tribune, Times, and Post, circulated everywhere, exciting and urging the people to effort. The leading statesmen of all sections took the stump for Lincoln and liberty, and great crowds at "mass meetings" hung with rapt attention upon the stirring speeches of their orators. These speakers included nearly all the Republican Senators and Representatives in Congress, the Governors of States, and all others who could effectively address the people; and every part of the free States was filled with speeches, newspapers, and documents, urging the people to resist the encroachments of the slave power. The Democratic national convention had met at Charleston, South Carolina, and after wrangling over platforms most of the delegates from the slave States withdrew, and finally the convention adjourned to meet at Baltimore, where it met and nominated Stephen A. Douglas for President. The seceding delegates nominated John C. Breckinridge. It is now clear that a considerable portion of the Democratic party did not desire the union of that party, did not wish for the defeat of Mr. Lincoln, but preferred, by dividing the Democratic party, to secure the success of the Republicans, intending to make that success the pretext for secession and disunion.

The great subject in dispute between the three parties was slavery.

First. The Republican party held that slavery was wrong, and that Congress rightfully could and ought to prohibit it in the Territories.

Second. The Breckinridge party held that slavery was right, and that neither Congress nor the people of a Territory could interfere with slavery outside of State lines; and that, while a Territory remained such, slavery legally existed there under the Constitution.

Third. The Douglas party, indifferent in regard to slavery, and while divided on the question whether Congress might prohibit, insisted that the whole subject should be left to the people of the Territories.

The most remarkable feature of this canvass was the novelty of a personal canvass made by Mr. Douglas. This was against precedent. He entered upon the canvass with all the vigor and spirit for which he was distinguished. He spoke in most of the free and many of the slave States. Mr. Seward made a tour through the Northwest, delivering speeches at Chicago, Madison, St. Paul, and in Kansas, of great power, originality, and dignity.

By the election of Mr. Lincoln was marked distinctly the period when political power passed from the slaveholding to the free States. Each census, each new apportionment of members of Congress, had seen the political power of the Union passing into the hands of the free States. Against these results the aristocracy of the slaveholders struggled in vain. The laws of nature and of God are not more inevitable in their operation than that in the race for power, freedom and free labor should outstrip slavery and slave labor. Conscious of this, unwilling to yield power, and determined not to give up slavery either to man or God, the slaveholders had deliberately resolved to extend slavery over all the Territories, to seize and appropriate Cuba, to conquer and annex Mexico, and thus secure the means of expanding the area of slavery, of controlling the Government, and ultimately making the States all slave, or in case of failure to dissolve the Union. There had long existed in the slave States a conspiracy to accomplish these purposes. The prohibition of the slave trade was an obstacle which they sought to remove, and practically evaded.

To an intelligent understanding of the events preceding the rebellion, and those which have occurred during its progress, the existence of this wide-spread, thoroughly organized conspiracy must be understood. A secret organization was well known previous to and at the time of the annexation of Texas. It was then known as the "Order of the Lone Star." Its ostensible and one of its real objects was the acquisition of Cuba. It finally became a conspiracy with the distinct and definite purpose of overthrowing the Federal Government in the slave States and establishing there a slaveholding confederacy. The election of Mr. Lincoln was a triumph, in a direct contest at the polls, between the slave aristocracy and free labor; a triumph of those who regarded slavery as a great moral wrong and a social and political evil; who meant to prohibit it in the Territories and to use all legal means to limit, restrain, and weaken its power. It was essentially a contest between democracy and aristocracy, between free and slave society. In the light of to-day it is clear that the slave power deliberately brought on the war to save itself from destruction by the rapid and irresistible growth of the free States. Nearly nineteen centuries ago, upon the plains of Judea, the great principle upon which all democratic government is based, the common Father and the universal brotherhood of man, was taught by the Son of God. These great Christian principles, the germ of human liberty, after struggling against all forms of political and religious tyranny through so many centuries, were finally and distinctly announced by our fathers when, on the 4th day of July, 1776, they proclaimed them in the Declaration of American Independence. Thomas Jefferson, the Democrat of Virginia, in penning that Declaration, struck the key-note of Christian freedom. He enunciated principles antagonistic to human slavery and brought on that irrepressible conflict with slavery which led to the triumph of liberty at the ballot-box in 1860. The slavery power instinctively felt that the death of slavery was only a question of time. Rather than surrender, the slave aristocracy determined to appeal to the sword, and hence this terrible war. Slavery having plunged the nation into war, it is fit it should die by the laws of war. Slavery is the rebel and the traitor, and the Government could do no less than make it an outlaw under our Constitution.

The free States, however, contemplated no infringement of the rights of the slave States.

The Chicago convention of 1860, while it declared its intention to prohibit slavery in the Territories, distinctly disclaimed any intention to interfere with it in the States. The existence of a conspiracy to dissolve the Union, and the participation in that conspiracy of some of those who secured Breckinridge's nomination, is established by the conduct of the leaders of those who nominated Breckinridge. By the nomination of two candidates the success of Mr. Lincoln was rendered morally certain, yet the leaders of the Breckinridge Democracy not only split the Democratic party, knowing the result would be Lincoln's election, but to render that result certain run electoral tickets in the free States, where the great mass of the party supported Douglas, and the opposition to him was only scattering. Thus the Breckinridge leaders deliberately secured Lincoln's election. Who were these leaders? They were Jefferson Davis, John Slidell, James M. Mason, and others. Their primary object was disunion. A meeting was held 25th of October, 1860, at Charleston, South Carolina, at the residence of Senator Hammond, at which the congressional delegation of that State, and Governor Gist and ex-Speaker Orr were present, in which it was resolved that South Carolina should secede in the event of Mr. Lincoln's election. Similar meetings were held by concert in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and other slave States. In November South Carolina authorized the immediate enrollment of ten thousand volunteers. In the same month Georgia appropriated $1,000,000 to arm and equip that State. Conventions were called in South Carolina, Georgia, Virginia, Mississippi, and Alabama. Little Florida sent a message by her Governor to Governor Gist of South Carolina saying "Florida is with the gallant palmetto flag." The Douglas and Breckinridge vote combined would have elected Douglas. The Douglas and Bell vote combined would have elected him. John C. Calhoun, who sowed the seed and nurtured the plant of secession, said to Commodore Charles Stewart, in 1812:

"It is through our affiliation with the [Democratic] party in the middle and western States that we hold power. But when we cease thus to control this nation through a disjointed Democracy, or any material obstacle in that party which shall tend to throw us out of that rule and control, we shall then resort to the dissolution of the Union."

On the 7th of November, 1860, it was known throughout the Union that Lincoln was elected. He could not be inaugurated until the 4th of March following. For four months the conspirators had control of the Government. James Buchanan, a weak, imbecile, if not treacherous old man, was President, and he was under the control of traitors in his Cabinet. Mr. Memminger, of South Carolina, said that, Mr. Buchanan being President, the General Government would be taken at a great disadvantage. They had prepared things so that Lincoln would, for a while, be powerless. A majority of his Cabinet were a cabal of conspirators seeking to disarm and dismantle the ship of State that they might surrender it an easy conquest to the traitors preparing to seize it. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, was Secretary of the Treasury. He so managed as to have $6,000,000 stolen from the Treasury, which he left empty. Jacob Thompson, of Mississippi, Secretary of the Interior, as a member of the Cabinet, learning that supplies were to be sent to the garrison in Fort Sumter, traitorously sent a dispatch to Charleston that the ship bearing the flag of his country might be fired upon, and the garrison of the Government of which he was a chief officer might be starved. He says:

"I sent a dispatch to Judge Longstreet that the Star of the West was coming with reinforcements. The State troops were then put on their guard, and when the Star of the West arrived she received a warm welcome from booming cannon, and soon beat a retreat."

John B. Floyd, of Virginia, was Secretary of War. It was important for the purposes of the conspiracy that the slave States should be armed and the free States should be disarmed, and that the little force of the regular Army should be sent to such a distance as not to be in reach of the Government. Hence Floyd, as Secretary of War, ordered four hundred and fifteen thousand muskets from Springfield manufactory and from Watervliet, New York, to be sent to arsenals in the slave States. A vast amount of cannon, mortars, &c., and nearly all the material of war were sent to the South. Having effectually served the rebels in this he fled to the South and received a commission of general in the rebel army. Isaac Toucey, of Connecticut, a more infamous traitor than even Floyd, as he was a traitor to both his section and his country, did the same thing for the Navy. (See report of the Secretary of the Navy, July 4, 1864.)

Thus the Army and Navy and Treasury were despoiled by traitors for the benefit of treason. But for the vigilant eye of one noble old hero, General Scott, their purposes would have been accomplished, and the inauguration of Lincoln have been prevented, and the capital and its archives have been surrendered.

PEACE CONVENTION.

To avert threatening war the peace convention was held, a convention of delegates from nearly all the free States, to see on what terms the disaffected and traitors could be induced to forego their purpose. There were many in the North who thought that the secession movement was a strike for additional guarantees for slavery. It had become the settled habit of the slaveholders to threaten to divide the Union whenever they wished to carry a point. They had demanded Louisiana, and it was purchased for them; Florida, and it was obtained; Texas, and it was annexed; the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and it was done; a new and stringent fugitive slave law, and it was passed. Many believed that by adding new guarantees and concessions the slaveholders could be placated. Liberal concessions and compromises proposed were defeated by the votes or refusal to vote of the traitors themselves who yet lingered in Congress, and who subsequently joined the rebels.

While movements of the conspirators were going on in the cotton States preparatory to revolution, the conspirators at Washington held their secret meetings, and leading Senators and members of Congress, acting in concert with the traitors in the Cabinet, so managed as to thwart all the movements of General Scott, and to paralyze the action of any officer of the Government looking to its preservation. There was a meeting held at the Capitol on the night of January 5, 1861, at which Senators Toombs and Iverson, Slidell and Benjamin, Wigfall, Jefferson Davis, and Mallory were present. They resolved in secret conclave to precipitate secession and disunion as soon as possible, at the same time that Senators and members of Congress should remain in their seats as long as possible to watch the action of the Executive and to defeat any hostile measures which might be proposed. In accordance with the determination of this band of conspirators Mississippi adopted the ordinance of secession January 9, Alabama and Florida January 11, Louisiana January 26, and Texas February 5. The seceding States appointed delegates to meet in convention at Montgomery. This convention met on February 4, and organized a provisional government, under which Jefferson Davis was elected.

president and Alexander H. Stephens vice president. Meantime, while traitors were plotting and the most active measures were going on by the conspirators at the Capitol, in the Senate Chamber, at the War and Navy Offices, and in the very cabinet of the Executive Mansion, no attempt was made by the President to interfere with, much less arrest, the known, open, and avowed traitors. The feeble old man in the presidential chair declared that while secession was wrong the Government had no constitutional power to prevent it. The conspirators were laboring to make the revolution an accomplished fact before Mr. Lincoln could be inaugurated, and thus secure themselves against an attempt on his part to maintain the Constitution and preserve the Government. They were active first in disarming and plundering the Government, taking possession of all forts, ordnance, and material of war, and arming themselves. On the 6th of March the rebel congress passed a bill for a military force of one hundred thousand men. There was much debate and discussion in Congress on measures of compromise, but the conspirators steadily refused to aid by vote in the adoption of any measures of pacification. It was clear that they had determined upon dissolution of the Union and revolution. Charles Francis Adams, one of the committee of thirty-three in the House of Representatives to report terms of conciliation, made a separate report, in which he said:

"No form of adjustment will be satisfactory to the recusant States which does not incorporate into the Constitution of the United States a recognition of the obligation to protect and extend slavery. On this condition, and on this alone, will they consent to withdraw their opposition to the recognition of the constitutional election of the Chief Magistrate. Viewing the matter in this light it seems inadvisable to attempt to proceed a step further in the way of offering unacceptable propositions."

The Democratic party in the free States were many of them slow to condemn the movements of the traitors. Their President and Cabinet were in office and their friends filled nearly all the Federal offices. There is little doubt the conspirators expected and counted upon the cooperation of the Democratic party in the free States. While these movements were going on Mr. Lincoln remained at Springfield, a deeply anxious spectator. No one will forget the dark and threatening aspect of affairs in this winter of 1860-61. A long-planned, deep-laid conspiracy, about to break upon the land, threatened all the horrors of civil war. Patriots saw the dark clouds gathering, saw the tornado coming, saw traitors plundering the ship of State, boring holes in her bottom, disabling her, disarming her, and preparing to scuttle her, and yet had no means to resist because the offices were filled with traitors. How impatiently they prayed for the 4th of March all will remember. All eyes were turned to the West, to Lincoln, as the man to rescue his country from the clutches of the conspirators. Hence, on his journey from Springfield to Washington, he was followed by crowds of anxious, devoted men, everywhere invoking for him the blessing, the guidance, the protection of Almighty God. How deeply he himself felt, and how oppressively he realized, the responsibilities resting upon him, appears from the beautiful, simple, and touching speech he made to his neighbors from the platform of the rail car, on starting, and bidding good-by to his old home. The feeling of the people was impressively exhibited by the mottoes on the banners which they extended across the streets along which he passed. "We will pray for you," "God help you," was often seen and repeated.

LINCOLN'S INAUGURATION.

No so solemn and impressive an inauguration as that of 1861 has occurred since the Presidency of Washington. Attempts had been made to throw the cars, which Mr. Lincoln traveled toward the capital from the track. Torpedoes had been placed upon the rails to blow up the car in which he rode. A conspiracy to assassinate him as he passed through Baltimore was discovered, which induced him, by advice of General Scott and others, to change his route and to pass through that city at an earlier hour than had been intended. Lieutenant General Scott, cognizant of the conspiracy and aware of the dangers, made careful preparation to secure the peaceful performance of the ceremonies of inauguration, and he earnestly advised

Mr. Lincoln to come directly and immediately to Washington. A great anxiety pervaded the public mind. It was known that the city of Washington was filled with traitors. But it was also known that there were, in addition to the few regular troops under General Scott, many thousand people from the North ready to defend with their lives the President of their choice.

The President, having been inaugurated, and passing to the White House, looked around him to possess himself of the situation.

Congress had adjourned without making any preparation to meet the impending difficulties. The rebel government, after its leaders had stolen the arms of the North, had seized the forts, arms, and material of war in the seceded States. They had robbed the Union of its arms. The public offices were filled with traitors. The White House itself, it is now known, had spies around the President's own hearth. Lee and Johnson, and Ewell and Hill, and Stuart and Magruder, and Pemberton and Winder, and very many others, still held commissions in the United States Army. So it was in the Navy. Traitors were everywhere in the public offices.

Such was the condition of things when this inexperienced citizen of Illinois assumed the presidential chair.

THE CIVIL WAR.

The conflict between freedom and slavery now assumed the proportions of a great civil war. It is not my purpose to follow the varying fortunes of that war, vast in the numbers engaged, stupendous in the material, and treasure, and precious human life expended. Through all its difficulties and dangers, through all its varying changes, from Bull-Run and Ball's Bluff, to Vicksburg, Gettysburg, Mission Ridge, and Fort Fisher; the rise and fall of generals; through the varying campaigns of McClellan, and Fremont, and Burnside, and Pope, and Hooker, and Meade, and Banks, and Butler, down to the later and brighter triumphs of Grant, and Sherman, and Thomas, and Sheridan, and Farragut, and Porter, the President has been always found faithful, patient, persistent, and resolute; his sagacious eye ever fixed steadfastly on one consummation—Union, liberty, and peace. With a courage that has never faltered, with a zeal that has never flagged, with a patriotism that has absorbed his whole soul, and heart, and life; with a faith and trust in God, in liberty, and justice never shaken, and with a confiding trust in the people, to which they have ever most generously responded, he has labored for the restoration of the Union. As the slaveholders' conspiracy sought to destroy the Union, to reconstruct it, with slavery the corner-stone, God has so shaped events that the Union will be restored with liberty the corner-stone. The great work of Lincoln—the restoration of the integrity of the Union—draws near its consummation. The gray of the morning begins to break; and soon the sun of peace will emerge through the lurid clouds of war.

PEACE.

But peace comes not yet. The conference in Hampton Roads has not brought it. The sun of peace will rise from behind the war-clouds that envelop the veterans of Sherman. It will break forth from some great battle-field in the South—a battle-field on which Lee's army shall be scattered and overthrown. The path to peace lies over the breastworks of Lee and through the defenses of Richmond! This peace, this permanent peace, when it comes, brings with it national unity, national liberty, a free Republic from Plymouth rock and Jamestown to the golden sands of the Pacific. It makes one nation of a territory extending from sunrise to sundown; from the land where ice never thaws to the sunny climes where water never freezes; and all this land shall have one flag, a homogeneous people, and one nationality. To accomplish such an end is a grand cause to fight for, a glorious cause to die for.

SLAVERY DIES BY ITS OWN HAND.

Slavery, having plunged the nation into this terrible civil war, dies by the sword it drew to maintain its own life and supremacy. That once haughty power, lately so proud and defiant, now totters to its final overthrow. Defeated in the field, its leaders the outcasts of the world, with sympathy from no Christian people, the leaders of the rebellion, who hold by military terror the people in subjugation, approach the end of their ignominious career. Their barbarous cruelties to Union prisoners and their management of the war has furnished the blackest page in the history of civilization. They have illustrated the brutalizing influences of their darling institution. For the sake of our race it could be wished that this page could be blotted from American history.

These last four years of war have done the work of a century. The rapid and radical change in public opinion may be traced in the action of Congress. The Thirty-Seventh Congress commenced by confiscating and freeing slaves used by rebels, freeing "contrabands." Then it enacted that no officer or soldier of the Union Army should restore a fugitive slave. Then it consecrated the national capital to freedom. It secured to the long-oppressed African the right to testify in the courts, the right to a fair jury trial, making all men equal before the law. Soon thereafter Congress prohibited slavery forever in all the territory which was then held or which might thereafter be acquired by the United States, thereby securing by that one act one third of the area of the nation to freedom. The Thirty-Seventh Congress went still further and declared that the slaves held by rebels should be free, and authorized the President to receive into the Army persons of African descent, thus conferring the privilege upon the negro of fighting for his liberty, and giving him the arms and the pay of a soldier, and inspiring the manliness of a freeman. That badge of northern servitude, the fugitive slave law, was repealed, and the coastwise slave trade prohibited. Meanwhile the Executive was not behind Congress in striking at the cause of the war. The great proclamation of freedom, which emancipated more than three million slaves, will live in history forever and carry the name of its author down to future ages as the emancipator of a race. The State governments also, as soon as relieved from the control of rebel influences, were equally zealous to relieve themselves of this curse alike to black and white. Maryland, West Virginia, and Missouri, adopted new constitutions abolishing and prohibiting slavery forever. The Union citizens of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee, are doing the same.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

But one step more remained to consummate this great work of securing liberty throughout the Republic—an amendment of the organic law, the Constitution, abolishing and prohibiting slavery throughout the United States. This the President recommended and urged as a consummation of the proclamation and of the laws of Congress.

The Thirty-Eighth Congress has immortalized itself by the adoption of the joint resolution submitting such an amendment of the Constitution to the States for their adoption. The States are ratifying this proposed amendment with earnest activity, and but a few months will pass before it will have been adopted by the requisite number to make it a part of the Constitution. The adoption of this constitutional amendment may be regarded as the national sentence of death to slavery pronounced by Congress. It is the event of the century, and will ever stand out in the record of man's history to mark the advance of the race.

Possibly this result might have been accomplished by peaceful agencies, but it would have required many long years. Nothing but this earthquake of war, brought on by the slaveholders themselves, could have accomplished this great revolution. Now, when victories first, and wise counsels after victories, shall bring peace—peace with liberty and union—our country will take her place, the leading Power of civilization, the head of Christendom.

In passing thus rapidly over these eventful years none can fail to recognize the hand of Almighty God in these most wonderful changes. I desire in these my last words in Congress reverently to invoke the blessing of God upon our beloved country, and that He will bless us and guide us through all the clouds which still overshadow our country to peace, union, and liberty secured by law.

Reconstruction—Mr. Blow.

HO. OF REPS.

RECONSTRUCTION.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY T. BLOW,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1865.

The House having under consideration the special order, being the reconstruction bill—

Mr. BLOW said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I enter into the discussion of the bill under consideration with the greatest hesitation. The scenes of the day on which the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery was adopted are fresh in all our minds; the long struggle, the fears and hopes, and the final triumph, stand out in bold relief, telling of a result more glorious, a spectacle more sublime, than ever before witnessed within these walls. Under these circumstances it will be difficult for me to fasten the attention of the House even on a kindred subject, and yet it would seem that a bill so intimately connected with the future of our people should command its highest respect.

I greatly fear, sir, that the condition of that portion of the country which I have endeavored in another way to present to the members of this House is hardly understood, certainly not appreciated. Conceal it as we may, the extreme West feel neglected and dispirited. It is so especially in my own State, and if you will pardon me, I will refer to a condition of affairs which is becoming worse and worse every day. I recollect very distinctly that last spring, when we made a similar statement, with a more complaining spirit than we now indulge in, we were assured, in many ways, of the sympathy which was felt for us, and the certainty that all we feared would never come to pass. We had to be content with this, and go home with the knowledge that we had utterly failed in impressing our real condition on our friends, and that perhaps they had concluded that our accounts were exaggerated by selfishness or timidity. Oh! sir, if the fears and losses of our five hundred thousand people, half of our population, loyal as any in this land, could be recited, what a history it would be!

While the prosperous States of the North have been absorbed in their contracts, their gold, and their merchandise, and their manufactures, what have we not suffered? And yet I will be told on the instant that everything that could be was done for us. I deny it. Never in the history of conflicts was there such a misunderstanding of the real condition. Our troubles commenced in Louisiana on Red river, followed us to Little Rock, and at the very time when every effort should have been made to save the loyal masses in Missouri, whose heroism has never been equaled except in the mountains of East Tennessee; I say at that very moment the ragged hosts of Sterling Price marched unimpeded through Arkansas, and entering southeast Missouri, came within seventy miles of St. Louis without meeting a Union force, and when finally the conflict came it was eight thousand veteran rebel troops against a single regiment of men who had not been thirty days under arms.

I will not dwell on the gallant defense of the fort at Pilot Knob; there is no brighter page in the history of this war; and to the daring and bravery of General Ewing and Colonel Fletcher (the latter now Governor of Missouri,) we can attribute the safety of St. Louis. In fact, if after the evacuation of the fort the rebels had marched boldly on they could have sacked and destroyed the city of St. Louis. Heaven ordained that we should be spared, but only that the victorious raiders should continue their march, leaving death and destruction in their pathway. The best information we have is that, notwithstanding his disasters in west Missouri, Sterling Price left the State with thousands of recruits and two thousand wagons filled with plunder. We have never estimated our losses at less than thirteen million dollars, and there is scarcely a Union family in the counties through which this reckless band of robbers marched that did not suffer, either from death or from outrages of the most shocking character.

There were forty counties in our State seriously affected by this invasion, and in most of them their crowning losses of life and property have almost deprived their long-suffering Union inhabitants of the little hope which still remained; yet our terrible condition and unheard-of losses were scarcely half told, and were known throughout the land only to be forgotten in a new excitement.

But I did not intend to discuss the errors of the past, nor am I complaining particularly of my Government. Our condition was misunderstood, and although the county of St. Louis, in which I live, had given $400,000 in bounties for the defense of the State, we did not hesitate to advance our credit for $700,000 more to the Pacific railroad, to repair the damage inflicted by General Price upon that great central means of protection and communication.

To-day, while we are praying for the admission of Arkansas, the ten regiments we raised for the defense of Missouri are in Tennessee; our militia are soon to be disbanded, and our gallant Governor is full of apprehension in regard to our safety. We are assured that General Price is on Red river with thirty thousand choice troops, preparing for a spring raid, and nearly half of the people of our State, unprotected and uncertain as to our future, are hesitating whether to remain at their homes or abandon them forever.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if any gentleman now on this floor would be content to remain quietly in his seat if he knew, as I know, that four years of civil war, during which time Missouri has suffered more than any three loyal States in this Union, (excepting only Kentucky,) were to be followed by another year of bloodshed and disaster—remain quietly, I say, while his constituents were unprotected and their property at the mercy of raiders and bushwhackers. The only remedy for us is the readmission of the State adjoining us, and a military organization from Louisiana to Iowa that will secure their peaceable possession and that of the Territories west not less disturbed by the enemy, so that the population remaining may sow and reap, and feel that our Government is equal to their protection.

But I am aware that it takes men and money to accomplish this, and thus save the lives and property of our people. I am also aware that the ingenuity of the Secretary of the Treasury is taxed to the utmost to pay the more pressing demands upon his Department. I am fearful, too, that our interest payable in gold, and our rapidly increasing debt, will soon bring us to a most trying condition; but still if we are ever to reestablish this Union we must not spare either men or money while either are at our command. This very moment is one of the most intense interest to the nation, and we to us if we lose a vast territory which can be saved by prompt and vigorous action. Bring them back, restore law and order, and infuse into all classes a confidence in their future safety, and the public debt will cease to increase so rapidly, and the national credit will advance at home and abroad. All kinds of proposals are being urged in order to obtain the nation's credit. While these States are kept out in the cold, where do gentlemen expect to get the $13,000,000 for the canal bills just passed, where the millions for other propositions just as meritorious, and where the hundreds of millions for those portions of the country upon which the treasure of the nation has already been lavished in order that they may be protected from foreign foes? Washing these valley States are the finest and largest navigable rivers of America, upon which the commerce and agricultural productions of the nation can be transported to the Gulf, so as to reach the markets of the world. Obstructed as they now are, the productions of the great West are forced into narrow and unnatural channels. Admit these States, open these great high ways to our immense fleet of steam vessels, and the millions saved on paper by the talented advocate of the Niagara ship-canal [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] will become a reality in the West; for on the instant the exactions of the rich corporations which now control the entire carrying trade of the country will cease, for the Mississippi river has always been and ever will be the natural outlet for all the States watered by it.

But to return. I do not, Mr. Speaker, wish to be misunderstood. Our sufferings and misfortunes have not and will not weaken our faith in the national honor, nor lessen our national pride. All that Missouri has of material wealth will be poured out as freely as the blood of her sons to preserve and perpetuate the union and freedom of the States.

I pray to be excused for dwelling so long upon our own affairs, and will pass on, remarking that, so far as I am concerned, any provision which will admit the States of Louisiana and Arkansas in time to save them in the future from the sufferings of the past, and strengthen the loyal masses now begging for admission into the Union, will receive my vote.

I know Louisiana well; her rivers, bayous, plantations, productions, and people are all familiar to me; and her great commercial city, which once rivaled the proudest in the land, has always had most intimate relations with those of the great valley, and especially with St. Louis. One fatal error wrenched this rich State from the Union which had been so faithful to all her interests. She has suffered for this, and I believe even those who were most to blame feel to-day that there is no future for them except in their old place.

But there is now another change. Suddenly, by her own act, she has been converted from a slave into a free State. This has been done by her loyal white population. But certain enlightened colored men, who, braving every danger, have stood up manfully for the Union, we think have fairly won the right to participate in the further reorganization of the State; these two classes by the bill really reconstruct the States, while every man, be he white or black, is equally free, and is equally protected in all his civil rights before the law. But here we stop, and I think wisely; the right of suffrage is a matter of the States, to be regulated by time and circumstances, and to be held as sacred in the future as it has been regarded with jealousy in the past; and I do not hesitate to declare, sir, that it would be unjust for Congress to concede the right, directly or indirectly, to a class just emerging from the ignorance of southern slavery; unjust to our native and naturalized citizens, and calculated to arrest the tide of emigration from all portions of the world ready to purchase our lands and push the car of progress ahead the moment that peace again blesses the broad acres that stretch from ocean to ocean, and from the Gulf to the frozen regions of the north.

But, sir, it is said, and sustained with a great deal of force by our theoretical abolitionists, that freedom to the slave and suffrage to the freed should go together, and be guaranteed by Congress, especially in the rebellious States. My views in regard to this assertion are based upon the history of our past and the hopes of our future unity. With all the proud recollections of our revolutionary fathers, and the prosperity and happiness of bygone days, we are still engaged in the most desolating and trying civil war the world has ever witnessed. I contend that if we are ever to recover properly from it we must be just when we triumph, and prove by our magnanimity and consideration that we are not endeavoring to punish and humiliate our white brothers by elevating to an equality with them, and in their midst, too, the unfortunate race that we have so constantly argued were debased and degraded by the cruel bondage of their now conquered and repentant masters. Perhaps in this connection it will be asked, Then what is to become of the colored race? I reply that our Heavenly Father, who has brought us to the condition we are in to-day, His last act of mercy paving the way for the triumph of constitutional freedom and sustaining us in all the efforts we have made for humanity, will not desert us or them.

My own opinion from the first has been strengthened by the lessons of history and by the course of events in the past three years. We see that these southern negroes cling to the warm climate where they drew their first breath, and are happiest in the midst of the cultivation to which they are accustomed. In Missouri, where they have been always well treated, they lose their natural buoyancy. The climate is too cold for them. They gradually decline, turn to a sickly hue, and become a prey to consumption, while every person of observation will testify to the elastic character of the negro, who basks in the sunshine of his native region, perspiring to his heart's content and to the benefit of his health over the work that has been lightened by the rich and nutritious food he constitutionally craves. From my earliest years I have known the race well; no prejudice rests on my mind toward them; they are simple, trusting, and affectionate in their character and dispositions, contented with little, greatly disposed to innocent amusements, lively, careless, but with an earnest vein of piety that shows itself in their love of sacred music and the touching eloquence of their prayers. They love, as I have said, the warm sunshine. They are as receptive as a sponge, and like a sponge cling to the heated coasts that are washed by oceans and rivers.

But a word in regard to those unnaturally planted in the colder climate of Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and northern Arkansas. It would seem, sir, that the hand of Providence is directing their course toward a more congenial region: They may linger for a long time in Maryland. More than half of them have long been free, but they have for years been flowing from old Virginia in a steady current south, and recently have been rushed out of the State; while in Kentucky, Missouri, and Arkansas, hundreds of thousands of able-bodied men have been run off by rebel masters, or taken south with our armies, never again, in my opinion, to occupy their former homes; leaving the institution in these splendid States so entirely valueless that every calculating and enlightened slave-owner felt that what remained of it was a burden no longer to be borne by him with profit or pleasure. I can testify to the genuine loyalty and liberality of many of the recent slave-owners of Missouri, who, like my eloquent colleague who came over so frankly for the constitutional amendment, not only part with their able-bodied slaves that they may defend the honor of the nation in our armies, but who will bow as he does to the will of our people, feeling that every consideration of justice, humanity, and policy, requires that the remainder should become free. For years in Missouri we have battled to confer upon them this inalienable right as no other State ever has or ever will. We have defended their manhood, advocated early their adoption as soldiers and sailors. We have sympathized with them in the trying ordeals through which they have passed in the rebellious States, hated the oppression that ground them to the earth, the barbarity that hunted them with blood-hounds, and the disgraceful inhumanity that has made Fort Pillow a monument of the demoralization of secession. And though the constitutional convention which is now in session in St. Louis may not and should not, in my humble judgment, grant them immediate suffrage, as has been proposed by some of our leading abolitionists, their future, in the hands of those who have so far advanced them, will never cause the friends of freedom to blush. When they are fitted for the highest privileges we enjoy they will not be denied them.

But, as I have said, secession has broken up the colored race in Missouri, and most of those left are old men and women and children, to pass away in a few years by death and emigration, and until that time to remain perhaps more isolated from the present population than in the days of slavery.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the people of the South and not those of the middle States, under all circumstances require the negro, even as he desires, to remain on the spot so dear to him; if slave, they make him a corner stone; if free, he is equally a necessity, not only to the South but to the entire country. Great liabilities incurred partially for his benefit have to be met, and all the labor we can command will be needed in our fields and workshops to repair the losses of the rebellion and to meet the demands of returning prosperity. Let us, then, encourage these people to remain just where they are, and, judiciously protected, let them and the men who have so nobly stood by our flag, work out their destiny. Millions of whites will be attracted to the favored region stretching along the Atlantic and the Gulf; its products will far surpass those of the palmiest days of organized slave labor, and wealth will be accumulated with startling rapidity; national pride will be restored; and if we adjust this great rebellion with the statesmanship demanded by the age, the people of both sections will forget the past in bringing back the recollections of the happier and better days of the Republic.

But suppose the blacks are thus compacted in their favorite clime, are they to remain separate and apart from our population, or, like the mighty river whose darker current is lost in the clearer waters of the Gulf, are they to be absorbed? This, to me, should not cause any uneasiness or keep a single man from voting them freedom and happiness. They have been at the mercy of our whites for a long time, and the result has been an admixture varying from one fourth to one tenth of the black population of the Gulf States. Secure them freedom, schools, and churches, the way to wealth, with the hopes they will indulge of political advancement in their own States, and we simply discharge an enlightened Christian duty. It may be that at some remote period, as has been often argued by philosophers and statesmen, and evidenced by the history of nations, we may witness the gradual absorption of the inferior by the superior race. The traveler who then writes of the sunny South will have to record the fact that a large proportion of the population, though not the pure white of the northern States, have the clear olive complexions of the tropics, and a tinge mantling their cheeks that discloses the richer, purer blood that courses through their veins; but I am free to say, that in my opinion such a condition will not occur in this century except from a heavy emigration into these States. And here comes the most delicate question in regard to reconstruction: if we leave the loyal resident masses of the South the solution of the problem, admixture to any extent will be avoided for the present, at least, and the most offensive proposition that has ever been forced by the errors of our forefathers on this suffering generation will not remain to disturb the harmony of a restored Union.

For myself, sir, though deeply interested in all that pertains to the rebel States, and looking as I am with intense anxiety for the moment they are to yield to us, my lot is cast with the great, free West. My father long ago abandoned that southern home where an impoverished family had no future. I was born near the stubborn, haughty capital where two mighty armies now confront each other, upon a soil that pride has christened sacred, and truly now can it be called most sacred. In its bosom reposes the Father of his Country; the best and greatest sons of the Old Dominion all lie there. My own ancestors, for generations, are moldering in her soil; and yet with me all these recollections are as nothing compared with the reflection that hundreds of thousands who have gallantly bled and died for freedom and unity also lie there.

But I was going to say that I have fought the battle of life so far with free white men. My heart has ever been with them; in the field, the workshop, and the mine. I live to urge State and national developments, and to advance the cause of civilization and progress; but the empire in which we live is large enough and rich enough for the true-hearted and industrious men of all nations and climes, and our hands of welcome are ever extended to them. My heart bounds now as I look over the rich and wide-extended valley which lies in that belt, embracing the Christianity, the cultivation, and genius almost of the world. There I have labored from my youth, and my prayer is that when I come to die—and I hope it may be in the Indian summer of life—that I may be buried in the midst of the brave, true men and women who have rescued Missouri from the grasp of slavery and fixed her, the brightest jewel, in the diadem of freedom. Could I feel less, after all my glorious State has accomplished, followed by all that the Switzerland home of loyalty has done for Union and humanity? I dare say more. If I had the power I would on the instant wrench this mighty mass of marble from its base, with its magnificent halls, where a nation sits in council, and its classic front, its dome of surpassing beauty, and helmeted goddess should look forever toward that mighty domain of which Missouri is the center.

Mr. Speaker, these remarks, thrown together rapidly, must be lengthened somewhat by an allusion to the very interesting collation of facts and the elaborate arguments submitted a few days ago by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] I am painfully aware, sir, that we do not agree as to the method in which we are to restore the rebellious States, except in the general idea and belief that no reunion can be blessed of God that does not bear the impress of His all-wise teachings. I will not attempt to answer his brilliant essay—many hours of toil and study as well as the rich experience of the gentleman's political career, are evidenced in its pages—but I may be permitted to remark, that while we are aiming at the same result our feelings separate us in the manner of reaching it. His whole effort is a defense of and tribute to the black man, and I am bound to infer from its tone that he has not been familiar with this race in the slave States. He proposes an amendment which in Louisiana would throw the question of suffrage in the hands of the black man. In other States to be reconstructed this would be the result to a greater extent than in Louisiana, and the whole argument is directed to the prostration, ay, sir, the humiliation, of the white man. Even in Arkansas and Tennessee they would hold the balance of power, and the devoted patriots of those States would have to submit their life-long experience of republican institutions and progress to the approval, if not the direction, of this class, admitted, I believe, by the gentleman to be just emerging from the ignorance of slavery. True, sir, he has referred to the colored descendants of the French and other early settlers in Louisiana, whose appeal, on a recent occasion, bears the marks of cultivation and elevation, and I too can testify to the loyalty and education of some of these very men, and the bill offered by the committee allows such as have shown their love of union and liberty, and thus ennobled themselves, the privilege which the gentleman proposes in his amendment.

But we are separated in this matter again by our feelings. I have perfect confidence in the loyalty of the white men in Louisiana and Arkansas now in possession of these State governments, and their perfect sincerity in dealing humanely with the black man, and will advocate no measure which slurs them or claims for us a deeper loyalty or purer patriotism. And if my friend will excuse me for going a little further, I think in his intense desire to do justice to the colored race he greatly underrates not only our white loyal brothers of the rebellious States, but does great injustice to the character and honor of the rebels themselves. I may be wrong, sir, but if peace could come to-morrow on the basis of freedom, as proposed by the President and endorsed by our own action, I do not think the good faith of those in arms against us would be doubted by the masses of the people in the loyal North, certainly not in the gentleman's own State. In this view I am sorry to differ widely with my friend. If I am mistaken and he is right, I will despair of ever seeing anything like the good feeling of the past in any reunion hereafter.

But, sir, I have a fault to find with the distinguished orator on another point. In Missouri, much as we have had to do with this great question, we have never lost sight of the obligations imposed upon us to take particular care of those in our own midst. For years before this rebellion, and during this rebellion, we have made enormous sacrifices to give them freedom. Our impelling motive was humanity and progress, directed in all cases by a superior regard for our own race. Now, sir, that we have triumphed I am sure that in good time our freedmen will enjoy all the rights that they are fairly entitled to. This, I am equally sure, will occur in Arkansas and Louisiana, from the enlightened impulses of the white man there; but how fare the 22,185 colored people in the gentleman's own city, 6,166 of whom to-day, by his own argument, should be voters, and many of whom should have had this right twenty-five years ago?

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOW. With great pleasure.

Mr. KELLEY. It is from no want of effort on my humble part that the American citizen of African descent does not enjoy the right of suffrage in Pennsylvania. When in the bosom of the Democratic party I advocated it. I never ceased to denounce the men who inserted the word "white," and made an odious distinction by which the moral and patriotic man may be disfranchised and the immortal traitor may enjoy the right of suffrage. The stain on Pennsylvania in that regard does not attach to me.

38TH CONG...2D SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Edgerton.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. BLOW. I will not make any charges against the member from Pennsylvania or the great party to which we both belong; but I will say this much, that when I commence the labor of love to which he has devoted his acknowledged talents, with the permission of the gentleman and his party in Pennsylvania, I will make the Quaker city missionary ground.

One point more, sir, and I am done. The honorable gentleman alluded to the South American republics to establish his theory in regard to the capacity of the black race and their happiness as freedmen and citizens with all the political rights under those Governments. It was my fortune, good or bad, sir, to reside in one of those republics, and under circumstances that gave me a full opportunity of investigating the cause of their revolutions and their deplorable condition both morally and politically. There are many noble people in South America, and the Mantuanos of Venezuela, as well as the Venezolanos, have virtues, not the least of which are their warm attachments and generous hospitalities. They are chivalric, too, and the pride of old Spain runs through their character; but when it comes to the colored and Indian races, the Mulattos, Mestizos, Zambos, and other mixtures, making up the large mass of the population, not only there, but generally in the republics of Spanish South America, the whole forming an element to be used by the wily demagogue, the observing American who sojourns long in their midst will be at no loss to account for the frequent revolutions that have degraded and beggared the people of that favored clime.

It is humiliating to acknowledge that the most enlightened nations of the world have had their diplomatic and commercial representatives in these countries for years without advancing the interests of religion and morality, and our own Government, I am ashamed to say, has not for many years before the present Administration done anything to elevate the character of these sister republics, though proclaiming all the time a doctrine which should have been strengthened by our sympathy shown in their advancement, and not in a policy which has hastened their decline, if not positively aided their revolutionists.

I beg my friend to examine the subject further and he will find that South American suffrage has not built up one stable government, and that the fate of Mexico may soon be that of those republics, demoralized if not ruined by mixed races; and when peace reigns throughout our land I will with all my heart join the honorable gentleman in any effort to reclaim and advance the people who were stimulated by us in their love of freedom, and among whom the prevailing sentiment is, "Querimus mucho a los Americanos." And here, sir, is an American who loves that unfortunate people. Beautiful Venezuela! How often have I gazed from your Calvaire upon the capital city, nestling in the bosom of the lofty Andes! How often have I dwelt in wonder upon the rich products of your prolific soil, the great white sugar-cane, the coffee tree in full bearing, and the fruits and flowers that even now I dream of, and felt that with such a Government as we once had the Indies would fail to rival you in wealth. I can never forget such a land, and the fate of her people is very near to my heart. God grant that the day may soon come when her mountains and llanos may team with an intelligence and morality that will guaranty peace and prosperity to those who have suffered so long and so patiently.

Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly aware that my views are not presented with the care and thought that distinguish many of the members of this body, fitted by culture and long experience for the discussion of the loftiest themes demanded by the condition of the day. I do not expect, sir, to instruct or enlighten this body or the country; but I do intend to do my part in impressing upon both the necessity of our being considerate in the adjustment of the great questions bearing upon our future union and happiness.

I should never think myself of endeavoring to direct the internal policy of the great State of Pennsylvania, or of the party there to which I belong. I should not dare, sir, at this moment to advance any theory, even if I had the acknowledged ability of those men of our own party who are now in the highest places in our Government, for the simple reason that I believe it to be the solemn duty of every loyal man, whose heart beats with the love of God and his country, to do first all in his power to restore that country before he ventures on any theory, and least of all one that is fraught with mischief, if not discord.

I demand for my own State, in whose metropolis is now assembled a convention composed of the heroic men who have grappled hand to hand with slavery, that we be permitted to settle this question of suffrage in our own way. I think we have a right not only to do this, but to expect that gentlemen who have had no such experiences, and live far away from the evil which we have overcome so thoroughly, will trust our manhood and intelligence.

Demanding this, I am bound to concede it to those in Louisiana and Arkansas whose experience surpasses ours, whose sacrifices are even greater than ours, and to doubt whose patriotism would, to my mind, be a crime almost equal to denying a colored population, long enlightened and refined, and living in the midst of philanthropists, the right of suffrage. I believe that if we are to come out of this struggle for free institutions in such a manner as will challenge the admiration and respect of the greatest nations of the earth we must raise, not lower, the standard of an American citizen. We must guard with a sacredness never felt before those privileges calculated to resist the ravages of time. No fears then can disturb our future; no kingly power or traitorous host arrest the march of progress and civilization. Our vast and varied resources will then be rapidly developed, our beautiful and fertile lands occupied by millions of Christian freemen. The daily light which softly rises from the bosom of the Atlantic will course its way over such an empire as the nations never saw; ay, an empire enjoying a degree of prosperity and happiness such as was never before vouchsafed to the children of men; and as its golden hues sink into the far-off Pacific the prayer of every lover of liberty throughout the wide, wide world, will be, GOD SAVE THE GREAT REPUBLIC!

RECONSTRUCTION.

SPEECH OF HON. J. K. EDGERTON,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1865.

The House having under consideration the special order, being the reconstruction bill—

Mr. EDGERTON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill before the House is one of preëminent importance, whether we regard its principles or its practical consequences. If it becomes a law it will establish a dangerous theory in our Federal system, and its consequences will be to change a Union hitherto really federative into a consolidated Union, republican for a time in form, but monarchical in substance. Legislative and executive action and judicial interpretation, and if need be constitutional amendment, will hereafter, as in the last four years, all be brought to bear to consummate and establish this result. What the remote consequences in the future may be upon the liberty and welfare of the people, on whom ever fall the evils of misrule, history will reveal, we can only conjecture. It is easier to pull down than to build up; it is easier to make changes than to make improvements. State sovereignty, once honored of the people, and which is the true conservator of the principles of democratic liberty and of our Federal system, has fallen into the sere and yellow leaf and goes tottering to an unhonored grave. Destroyers, quite as much as creators and builders have had fame in history. The men of this Administration, the John Browns of this day and generation, have more honor even here in this legislative Hall, sir, than the master spirits who made our system of government and gave it to us as a priceless inheritance. We are but verifying the satire of the poet:

"The aspiring youth that fired the Ephesian dome, Outlives in fame the pious fool that reared it."

Mr. Speaker, there are two questions which should test every measure of legislation proposed in this House. These are: First, is it constitutional? Second, is it politic or expedient? Tried by these tests the bill before the House, in any of the forms in which it has been presented, wholly fails to commend itself to my approval.

I do not oppose this bill, sir, because it is per se an anti-slavery measure, as it clearly is, for I am and ever have been an anti-slavery man; and if I were to follow merely my anti-slavery sympathies, and not my judgment and convictions of duty as a citizen and a Representative, I might not oppose the bill. If its object was by Federal power to impose slavery constitutions, instead of anti-slavery constitutions, upon the southern States, I would oppose it for the same reasons that now command my opposition. It would be sufficient reason for my opposition that in either case the bill would be a direct and revolutionary invasion of the reserved rights of the States. And here, sir, once for all, in my own behalf and in behalf of the great political organization with which I have the honor to act, if I do but utter one of its humblest voices, I deny that it is or ever has been a party in the interests of slavery, or that its opposition to anti-slavery legislation by the Federal Government has been based upon a desire to extend or perpetuate slavery. It has, sir, been eminently a party for democratic progress in all things, and as the best and surest means to achieve that progress it has been a party for, and in the interest of the Federal Union and Constitution. To their preservation it has subordinated the question of negro slavery and all kindred questions. Its purpose has been to stand by and maintain, in letter and in spirit, the bond of Federal Union, which granted to the Federal Government control over national affairs, and left to the States, as their reserved, inherent, sovereign right, control over their own domestic affairs; and of these negro slavery is one. Such has been from the beginning, and is now, the position of the Democratic party, and it ill becomes those of its opponents who, whether under the name of Whig or Democrat in other years, and, I may say, in recent months, held opinions identical with those of the Democratic party upon the constitutional power and policy of Federal intervention with negro slavery, to impugn, as they do, the motives of Democrats who remain faithful to their principles, or to charge them with infidelity to their country because they have a higher standard of duty, a surer anchorage for their political opinions than in the hope of office and popular applause, or in the changeful results of popular elections. I rejoice to know, sir, that there are still on this floor faithful Representatives of the one million eight hundred thousand Democratic voters of the United States; such Representatives, sir, as can neither be purchased, nor seduced, nor intimidated by the power of a corrupt Administration, nor swayed by popular clamor. I am thankful that, when the Constitution of my country, under the form of a constitutional amendment, was stricken down by the strong hand of a revolutionary majority in this Hall on the 31st of January last, the deed was not done by representative men of the Democratic party of the United States. The Democratic party stands by the Constitution, it stands by the bond of Union, it stands by the rights of the States, and it will not be found consenting to their death; and when that great party shall pass away as a living political organization, it will be because the Constitution also has passed away.

Before considering the leading provisions and character of this bill I propose to look briefly at its history.

The forerunner of this measure of legislation, so far as this House is concerned, may be found in the territorial bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] from the Committee on Territories in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, in March, 1862. It was aptly termed at the time

Reconstruction—Mr. Edgerton.

by the gentleman's colleague from the Cincinnati district of Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] "A bill to dissolve the Union and abolish the Constitution of the United States." The bill was summarily, if not indignantly, rejected by the House without a second reading. But, sir, men and events have since changed, if the Constitution of the United States has not changed, and the stone of revolutionary reconstruction then rejected by the master-builders in this House bids fair to become the head of the corner. Then the Constitution was not altogether repudiated as the foundation of our legislation; now revolutionary opinions and plans override it as a thing of the past. Not many are there in this Congress, and fewer there will be in the next, I fear, to do reverence to the Constitution and obey its commands.

Early in the last session of Congress this House, on a resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HENRY WINTER DAVIS,] authorized the appointment of a special committee of nine, called the committee on the rebellious States, to consider and report by bill upon the subject of the reconstruction of States. The ostensible or declared purpose of the committee was to carry out the constitutional guarantee of republican government to States in which such governments had been usurped or overthrown.

The President, by his amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863, accompanying his annual message to Congress of that date, with characteristic oblivion of the true character and limitations of his executive powers, had assumed to take the subject of reconstruction pretty much into his own hands. He had assumed to amplify the power to pardon offenders against the laws into a power to reconstruct States, to dictate State constitutions, and to determine the conditions upon which a sovereign State of the Union should or should not be recognized and protected as a State in the Union. This portion of the President's message was referred to the special committee I have alluded to. The amnesty proclamation, like its forerunners, the proclamations of September 22, 1862, and January 1, 1863, was an unprecedented and startling assertion of executive power, and I feel well assured, sir, for I have too high an opinion of their intelligence and patriotism to believe otherwise, that it did not meet the approval of the leading minds of the friends of the Administration in this House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] whose ability and experience entitle him to speak as an oracle of his party on this floor, declared in his speech of 22d January, 1864, that the President's plan of reconstruction, as stated in the amnesty proclamation, "is wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution," and found its justification only in the war power and in the theory of military conquest. "It proposed to treat the rebel territory as a conqueror alone would treat it." To the principle of the plan, that is, the right to treat the southern people as a foreign and conquered people, the gentleman from Pennsylvania assented, (for that was a favorite theory of his own,) but to the details he did not agree, and I doubt not that one object of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as well as the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] in conjointly moving the resolution for a special committee, was to take from the usurping hand of the Executive and to exercise through Congress the legislation that might be deemed necessary to restore the relations of the southern States to the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, the love of power, like the love of fame,

"Howe'er concealed by art,
Reigns more or less in every human heart."

It is not an idle passion in the breast of the constitutional President of the United States. It is there, restless, active, aggressive, and grows by what it feeds on.

The President as the author of the emancipation proclamation, on which (though not original with him and forced on him by pressure) he had planted his hope of historic fame, was determined by the work of his own hand to carry it out to its logical results. He had formed his plan of reconstruction, he had proclaimed it to the world, and in the same spirit in which he adhered to his plans of military campaigns, though baffled and butchered Union armies, "driven like bullocks into the slaughter-pen," attested his unwisdom, he would admit no rival near his throne to share his honors as the great emancipator. Therefore without waiting for the legislative action of Congress, which was clearly contemplated by the terms of the resolution appointing the special committee of nine, the President moved straight forward to his purpose of reorganizing Louisiana, Arkansas, and I may say Florida, in his own way. Whether the sagacious mind of the President was even at that early period of the Presidential campaign looking forward to the possible contingency of the need of electoral votes from those three States and others he might reconstruct, I will not undertake to say. I leave that question to gentlemen who know the President better than I do; but, sir, my charities are not large for a public magistrate whose public career has been marked by the grossest inconsistencies of principle, and by usurpations of power that have time and again remorselessly and without apology or atonement stricken down the liberties of innocent men and almost blotted out Constitutional limitations so plain that he who runs might read and understand. I need not go into specifications of the truth of what I say, for the history of the country is full of the testimony, and the living witnesses are all around us.

On the 11th of January, 1864, General Banks, commanding at New Orleans, issued a proclamation to the people of Louisiana, "in pursuance of authority vested in him by the President of the United States," proposing by the action of not less than one tenth of the voting population of the State to hold an election for State officers on the 22d of February following, and further proposing an election on the first Monday of April following for delegates to a constitutional convention to revise the constitution of Louisiana, and declaring that "the basis of representation, the number of delegates, and the details of election will be announced in subsequent orders." On the 13th of February, 1864, General Banks issued his general order No. 24, defining the qualifications of voters at the election for State officers on the 22d of February, and prescribing other rules for the election. As in the proclamation of the 11th of January preceding, the taking of "the oath prescribed by the President in his proclamation of the 8th of December, 1863," was made essential to "the right to vote in the election of State officers on the 22d day of February, 1864," but it did not reiterate as part of such qualification "the condition affixed to the elective franchise by the constitution of Louisiana."

On the 11th of March, 1864, General Banks, by his general order No. 35, fixed the 28th day of March instead of the first Monday in April as the day of election of delegates to the convention, and prescribed the time of their meeting, the basis of representation, numbers of delegates, and other details of election.

The proclamation of January 11, among other things, declared inoperative and void so much of the constitution and laws of Louisiana as related to slavery. It made the oath of allegiance or amnesty oath prescribed by President Lincoln, with the condition affixed to the elective franchise by the constitution of Louisiana, a qualification of suffrage. It confirmed and approved a registration of voters not inconsistent with the orders and proclamations of the President, which had been effected through the military governor, and "the several Union associations." It declared the fundamental law of the State of Louisiana to be martial law.

It is needless, sir, to state further the terms and character of this proclamation. To the members of this House at least it is a familiar paper, and it ought to be in the hands of every man in the United States as a memento of the times, to remind him how easy and swift may be the transition from a free constitutional government to a military despotism; and how simple a thing it is for a public magistrate who does not comprehend or regard constitutional obligations to overturn and hold for naught the plainest mandates of a free Constitution. Under this proclamation of General Banks a State government and constitution were ordered to be made for Louisiana, resting upon martial law as the fundamental law of the State. Under this process and influence of martial law elections have been held in Louisiana. State officers chosen, an ostensible State government established, a new constitution adopted and put in operation, and Senators and Representatives elected to Congress.

"Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud
Without our special wonder?"

It matters not to me, sir, that such things are done in the name of the United States, or that they are done by the authority of the President calling himself "the Executive Government of the United States;" "the government of Louisiana" thus created is none the less a government of usurpation. One object of the bill before us is to recognize this usurped government based upon a void military decree, and we cannot recognize the government without recognizing the proclamation as a valid act of executive power. I therefore, in this connection, though somewhat to the interruption of the course of my narrative, make a further brief comment on the proclamation of General Banks. The proclamation declared inoperative and void the constitution and laws of Louisiana in regard to slavery. By what right or pretense of right was this done? Was it because "slavery and martial law in a free country are altogether incompatible" as declared by General Hunter in his proclamation of emancipation of May 9, 1862? Not so; for on the 19th day of May, 1862, that proclamation was declared void by President Lincoln, who permitted both martial law and slavery, however incompatible, to continue together in Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina, the States covered by Hunter's proclamation, until the 1st day of January, 1863, when the President assumed to destroy slavery by his own edict of that date, but it is to be noted specially excepted from this proclamation certain parts of Louisiana, including the city of New Orleans, where both slavery and martial law were then existing together.

Now the whole argument for the emancipation edict has been military necessity. It was, as I said, a measure deemed proper by the President to subdue the enemy. The fact of the exception of New Orleans and other parts of Louisiana from the operation of the edict is an admission by the highest military authority, the President himself, that the military necessity for emancipation did not exist there, and of course the right under the war power did not exist. General Banks's proclamation confirms this admission by calling for a civil government to supersede the military one, so far as related to the civil affairs of the State. If Louisiana was, on the 11th of January, 1864, ripe for civil government, in harmony with the Federal authority, where was the military necessity to make void the constitution and laws of the State, regarding slavery, a purely civil relation? If the military necessity did not exist on January 1, 1863, why did it exist on 11th January, 1864, so far as related to New Orleans and other parts of the State excepted by the President? Under what power and right, then, did General Banks declare void the constitution and laws of Louisiana as to slavery? Can any man tell? Was it on the ground that Louisiana, a State of the United States, had been conquered by Abraham Lincoln, and was subject to a government by him, upon "a plan outside of and wholly unknown to the Constitution" of the United States? Is that, or is it not, the basis of emancipation and reconstruction in Louisiana? Has the President of the United States, using the Army and Navy thereof, power under any pretense, or for any cause, to conquer a State of the Union, so as to give him or the Congress power to govern it outside of the Constitution? Is the Government of the United States, at some times and for some purposes, in its relations to the States, a constitutional Government, confined within the Constitution, and at other times, and for other purposes, a despotism, outside of and unknown to the Constitution, and in both cases a rightful Government?

The Government of the United States, sir, as I understand it, is no such incongruous system, no such Janus-faced anomaly as the theory of this bill and of this Administration would make it; it is not at once law and no law, liberty and despotism; it is no form of horrible monstrosity like Milton's Sin—

"Woman to the waist, and fair,
But ended foul in many a scaly fold,
Voluminous and vast, a serpent arm'd
With mortal sting."

For one I desire more light from the gentlemen of the majority as to the character of the duplex government they have developed into such vigorous life during the last four years. I desire to know for my constituents and myself under which government, the constitutional Government of the United States or the despotism of the President or Congress, it is our privilege to live. Under the Constitution I know their rights and mine; under the despotism I am tossed upon a sea of conjecture; I forever wander in the mazes of uncertain argument, knowing neither the character nor limit of rights, Federal, State, or personal.

The practical evil of these dangerous heresies which are daily obscuring in the minds of the people all correct ideas of free constitutional Government, and breaking up the foundations and framework of the Constitution, and establishing a despotism that governs by its own discretion and judgment of expediency and not by law, is apparent not alone in Louisiana and other States declared to be in rebellion, but in States not in rebellion, and where there can be no honest pretense for the exercise of powers extra constitutional.

A military court, composed of elements affording no guarantee of justice to any man whose political opinions were not in accord with those of the men in authority, has lately for months, in defiance of the Constitution, and laws of the land, been engaged in trying citizens of my own State for alleged conspiracies against the Government. Three of those citizens, up to the time of their arrest men of good repute, and apparently peaceful, law-abiding men, have by this military court been convicted and sentenced to death, and now await their doom in prison at Indianapolis, with no apparent hope of life but in the clemency of the President. Sir, citizens of a State preëminently faithful to the Union, where courts of law are open and the course of public justice unobstructed, except as this Administration has obstructed it by lawless invasion of constitutional rights, it was the right of these men, wholly unconnected as they were with the military service of the United States, if they were guilty or accused of any crime known to the laws, to be indicted and tried according to the laws before a jury of their peers, and that they have not been so indicted and tried is in my judgment a flagrant outrage not alone upon the men accused, but upon every citizen of Indiana who, by the precedent in this case, becomes exposed without protection of law to the same danger.

I speak of this case, sir, in illustration and by way of condemnation, not because of any sympathy with the condemned men in any purpose or conspiracy they may have formed or attempted to execute hostile to the State or Federal Government—for those who know me best in Indiana know where I stand in regard to these men and all secret political societies and their alleged conspiracies—but because I desire that, in their case as in every other, the law should be vindicated by the law; and because I believe that this should be a free, and not a despotic military Government; and that the vilest criminal that ever crouched before the bar of public justice has rights before the law that should be sacred in the eyes of magistrates and people.

Pending the progress of the military manipulation of a portion of Louisiana, comprising mainly, in votes if not in territorial area, the city of New Orleans, into a reconstructed State according to the President's plan, the bill of the last session, commonly known as the reconstruction bill, and identical in title and similar in its general purposes to the bill now before the House, was reported from the committee on the rebellious States, debated, passed on the 4th day of May last, sent to the Senate, debated and amended there, and finally adopted as it passed the House on the 2d July last, and sent to the President for approval. It was not approved by him, for the reasons stated in his proclamation of the 8th July last.

The President's objections to the bill may be summed up in three points: First. His unwillingness "to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of reconstruction." Second. That the effect of the bill would be to set aside and hold for naught the free State constitutions of Louisiana and Arkansas, adopted under his proclamation of 8th December. Third. That he was unprepared to declare by an approval of the bill "a constitutional competency in Congress to abolish slavery in States."

Is it not wonderful, sir, that the President, who had swallowed the camel of executive emancipation should thus have strained at the gnat of congressional abolition? If General Banks could make void the constitution and laws of Louisiana by a military order, why could not Congress do the same by a legislative act? Was it, sir, an honest constitutional scruple or love of power that pointed this objection of the President to the congressional bill?

The sufficiency of the President's reasons for virtually vetoing the reconstruction bill were, soon after the publication of his proclamation, considered in an able paper made public by a distinguished Senator of Ohio [Mr. WADE] and an equally distinguished member of this House, [Mr. HENRY WINTER DAVIS.] The tenor of their masterly and conclusive argument against the President is best stated in their own words, when they say of the President's anomalous proclamation:

"A more studied outrage on the legislative authorities of the people has never been perpetrated."

And further:

"It is a blow at the friends of his Administration, at the rights of humanity, and the principles of republican government."

These assertions, sir, answer, so far as their authors are concerned, my question as to the honesty of the President's constitutional doubt. A studied outrage, sir, is not the fruit of an honest doubt.

However conclusive the arguments by which these grave charges against the President were justified, they failed to satisfy me that the reconstruction bill itself was a proper act of legislation. The question between the President and his two congressional friends was to my mind one between two usurping powers, the executive and the legislative; but I am free to say my sympathies were with the legislators and not with the President. Executive edicts have done more than acts of Congress during the last four years to sap the foundations and remove the landmarks of the Constitution. I deprecate all encroachments by one department of the Government upon another, but as a choice of evils I will trust usurping legislators rather than usurping Presidents; the former may usurp power from mistaken opinions as to the public good, the latter can rarely do so except from motives of personal aggrandizement. Power diffused tends to liberty, power concentrated tends to despotism; and the liberty depending upon any one will, admitting no constitutional restraints, holds its life by a very uncertain tenure.

The President's will undid the work of his friends in the last Congress in their efforts to reconstruct States. The Executive triumphed over the legislative power, and notwithstanding his "studied outrage on the legislative authorities of the people," the majority in Congress kissed the hand that smote them, and in spite of the reconstruction bill, in defiance of its well-matured provisions, Louisiana and Arkansas, States reared and reconstructed under the President's hand and plan, upon the basis of martial law, now knock confidently at our doors for recognition.

The crisis of the election being past, a renewed effort is made by the committee on rebellious States to carry out their plan of reconstruction.

The various forms in which the subject-matter before the House has been presented, the conflicting arguments which have been urged in its support, all indicate that division of counsel exists among those controlling legislation here, and who, having a common purpose, should have a common plan for its success.

The reconstruction bill of this session as originally reported, contained a section (the seventh) directly and without conditions recognizing the government and constitution of Louisiana as organized under General Banks's proclamation. Why Arkansas was not included I do not know; but the provision as to Louisiana was evidently intended to propitiate the President to approve the bill. It seemed to be a compromise between the House and the President, saying to him, "You may take Louisiana by executive reconstruction, and we will remake Arkansas by congressional reconstruction." For some reason this proposition has been withdrawn from the committee's bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] but it stands in the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] accompanied by the further offering to the President by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] of a proposition virtually to confirm the emancipation proclamation of January 1, 1863. The committee's bill, as modified, now proposes to recognize Louisiana and Arkansas under their new constitutions provided conventions of those States shall incorporate into their constitutions the conditions prescribed in the twelfth section of the bill; and provided further that it shall appear by the United States marshal's enrollment that the persons who had taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, together with the citizens of the United States from such States in the military or naval service, amounted to a majority of the persons enrolled in the State.

As there is therefore a direct proposition before the House to recognize unconditionally the new government of Louisiana, I shall here say what further I have to say on that subject. The case of Arkansas I shall not specially discuss, for the principle of both cases is the same; both rest on the amnesty oath as a condition of suffrage, and if Louisiana is not entitled to recognition, neither is Arkansas.

I do not believe, for I have no reason to believe, that the constitution and government of Louisiana seeking recognition here are the free act of the people of Louisiana in any constitutional or even moral sense of that term. I do not profess to speak from thorough knowledge nor dogmatically on this question; but there are a few facts and figures bearing upon it which are conclusive to my mind, aside from what I have said of the amnesty proclamation and General Banks's order. I gather them, in part, from a pamphlet by Mr. Thomas J. Durant, of New Orleans, addressed to a member of this House, [Mr. HENRY WINTER DAVIS,] which has doubtless received the attention of many members.

The government and constitution we are asked to recognize are assumed to be the government and constitution of the State of Louisiana. The territory of that State is 41,346 square miles in area, and its population, according to the census of 1860, was 700,802 persons, and its total white vote in the presidential election of that year was 50,510.

Now, it appears that at the election of the first Monday of September last, upon the adopting or rejecting of the proposed constitution of the April convention, but twenty out of forty-eight parishes of Louisiana voted on the question; that these twenty parishes, comprising an area of but 13,804 square miles, or about one third of the State, cast 6,836 votes for the constitution and 1,566 votes against it, making a total of 8,402 votes, when 26,634 votes were cast in the same parishes in 1860; that of these 8,402 votes, 5,451 were cast in the city of New Orleans alone, and that that city therefore cast a majority of the votes given for the constitution. The consequence is that the new constitution and government of Louisiana were made by the city of New Orleans alone, and would have been so made had every vote outside of the city been unanimously cast against the constitution. Is it not an absurdity, sir, to call such a vote a vote of the State of Louisiana—6,836 votes to make a State government and organic law for 700,000 people of a State! A government thus made deserves to be called an oligarchy rather than a democracy or a republic.

We all know that since New Orleans was opened up to northern men by General Butler, the cotton speculator, the sugar speculator, and the cormorants of all vocations, from New England and other sections, have rushed to New Orleans as to an El Dorado for fortune-hunting men. To them "loyalty" has been great gain; and I believe it will be found that these are the men who have been molding the State of Louisiana into its present shape before this House. Their money and influence have been potent in the work of reconstruction. The plan of reappealing the conquered rebel States is already showing its fruits. For one, sir, when I cast my vote, if ever, to welcome Louisiana again among the States freely and fairly represented upon this floor, I do not intend to welcome some other State or its instruments under the borrowed or stolen garb of Louisiana. Massachusetts and New England have power enough in this Congress and in this Union already, in their own proper Representatives, without taking the name and constitutional functions of Louisiana. I will not, sir, for any cause, disfranchise the free-born white men of Louisiana, "native there and to the manner born," in order to enfranchise and place in power the adventurers who, following in the wake of Federal military power, have pounced upon New Orleans and the desolated plantations of Louisiana as the vulture plunges upon the slain of the battle-field. I am not in favor of the plan of devastation, extermination, and reappealing advocated by some men. I will rather wait the coming of the auspicious, and, I hope not distant day, when the people of Louisiana, the real sons of the State, weary and sick at heart of their wild pursuit of the ignis fatuus of secession, shall of their own accord return to the Union as our fathers made it and their fathers accepted it—when Louisiana, once an alien to the Union, became bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh.

On these grounds, then, sir: first, because it was initiated and built up by Federal military power, exacting an unconstitutional and oppressive test oath as a basis or condition of suffrage, and creating a quasi duress over the people of Louisiana; and, secondly, because I have no evidence that it is the act of the people of Louisiana in any proper legal sense of the word, I am opposed to recognizing the new government and constitution of Louisiana as proposed in this bill; and I apply the same points of objection to the case of Arkansas.

Passing from the case of Louisiana I shall consider with as little of detail as possible, for I do not wish to weary the House, the prominent features of the bill and amendments before us.

Ostensibly and by its title the bill is one "to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government;" but the title is a misnomer. The mask of the Constitution is on the face of the bill; but usurpation and despotism are in its heart. The bill in fact is, as it is commonly called and known, a reconstruction bill. What, in brief, does it contemplate and propose?

1. A temporary, provisional, civil government by Federal officers, appointees of the President, over the States in rebellion, as Territories or military provinces—for that is the effect of the bill—which shall disregard all laws and usages of the State in favor of slavery, and shall extend to negroes as to white men the criminal laws of the State, and the qualifications of jurors.

2. Confirmation of emancipation to all persons and their posterity in all the States and parts of States covered by the President's emancipation proclamations, and the extension of the writ of habeas corpus by United States courts to discharge such persons when claimed and held as slaves, and making it a crime to attempt to enslave any person thus declared free, punishable by a fine not less than $1,500 and imprisonment for not less than five years.

For a slaveholder, therefore, to doubt the infallibility of the President and Congress, and to attempt to hold his slaves against their acts, is a high crime by this proposed law.

3. Disfranchisement as citizens of the United States of all persons who, after this act, shall hold military office under the confederacy from the rank of colonel upward, or any civil office not merely ministerial.

4. The formation of a new State constitution and government "so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States." The proceedings initiative of such government are to be taken by the Federal governor, aided by a State convention over which he shall preside; in the election of delegates to which convention the right of suffrage is to be extended to negro citizens who can read the Constitution of the United States, as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and to white citizens, and to all citizens of the United States, irrespective of color, who are in the military or naval service of the United States, all first having taken the oath of allegiance under the act of July 2, 1862. All persons who have held any office, State or Federal, under the rebel usurpation, or borne arms voluntarily against the United States, are to be excluded from voting for or being elected as delegates, even if they offer to take the oath of allegiance.

In regard to the right of suffrage, and the right to be delegates to the constitutional convention, the last amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] in the nature of a substitute for the whole bill and amendments, (but which I have not had time fully to examine,) goes beyond any previous proposition, and virtually would give to the freed negroes the right both to vote for and be delegates to the constitutional convention. I refer to sections three and five of the last amendment or substitute. In the phrases "all male citizens of the United States," in section three, and "all citizens of the United States," in section five, are wrapped up the two cardinal ideas of the party in power—negro suffrage and negro equality.

5. The bill makes it the duty of the constitutional convention not only to declare submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States, but to incorporate into the State constitution these conditions:

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the convention shall declare, on behalf of the people of the State, their submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and shall adopt the following provisions, hereby prescribed by the United States in the execution of the constitutional duty to guaranty a republican form of government to every State, and incorporate them in the constitution of the State, that is to say:

First. No person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, except civil offices merely ministerial and military offices below the grade of colonel, State or Confederate, under the usurping power, shall vote for or be a member of the Legislature, or Governor.

Second. Involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and freedom and equality of civil rights before the law are guarantied to all persons in said State.

Third. No debt, State or Confederate, created by or under the sanction of the usurping power, or in any manner in aid thereof, shall be recognized or paid by the State; and all acts, judicial or legislative, for the confiscation or forfeiture of any debt, property, or franchise, of any loyal citizen of the United States, are hereby declared null and void.

The constitution thus formed, to be submitted to a vote of the people of the State entitled to vote for delegates to the convention, and, if approved, certified to the President, who, after obtaining the consent of Congress, is by proclamation to recognize the State government thus established; and thereafter, and not before, Senators, Representatives, and presidential electors, may be chosen in such State.

6. If the convention refuse to reestablish the State government on the conditions prescribed, the provisional governor is to dissolve the convention, and the State remains in its territorial or provincial condition, under military duress, until the President shall see fit to direct the provisional governor to order a new election, when the same process shall be gone through with until a government to suit the prescribed terms shall be accepted by the people.

The effect of all this is—

1. To take from the people of the State all power to initiate proceedings to reorganize their own State government in harmony with the Constitution of the United States, or even to prescribe the qualifications of suffrage. The bill ignores the idea that there is any vital power in the people to restore their State government—not only taken from them by rebellion but kept from them by Federal power—until the Federal authority awakens the latent power of the people, puts it in motion, gives it direction, prescribes its mode and instruments of action, and defines and limits its results.

2. The effect is to exclude from the reorganization the entire white population of the State who shall have held office or voluntarily borne arms against the United States, or who shall not take the oath of July 2, 1862.

3. To confine the right of suffrage and power of reorganization to enrolled men and Federal soldiers taking the oath; and the law affords no guarantee that even the enrollment shall embrace a majority of males over twenty-one years of age. The majority required as a basis of action is so many of enrolled persons taking the oath as, with the soldiers, shall constitute a majority of the persons enrolled; that majority, through defect or fraud in enrollment, may be not even one tenth of the males of the State over twenty-one years of age.

4. The effect is the absolute disfranchisement of eleven States and their continuance in a state of war until they accept "the abandonment of slavery," as dictated to them by the United States, and until by organic law they declare that all persons shall have "equality of civil rights before the law" of the State; a well-seeming phrase of broad import, the precise meaning of which I do not understand. A woman is a person, a negro is a person, an alien is a person, and the right of suffrage is a civil right. Does this high-sounding phrase of the bill mean that women, negroes, and aliens shall all have equal right to vote in a regenerated State with white male citizens? What does "equality of civil rights before the law for all persons" mean?

Now, it is to be borne in mind that these will be the effects of the proposed bill upon States in which the bill itself assumes as a condition precedent of this Federal dictation that "military resistance to the United States has been suppressed, and the people have sufficiently returned to their allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States." If so, why treat them as aliens and enemies, conquered subjects of an imperial Power?

In fact and in purpose, then, the bill before the House is one to abolish slavery in the United States, and to enfranchise and elevate negroes, and to disfranchise and degrade white men; a bill to change the social and industrial systems and internal policy of eleven States; a bill to take from those States their inherent reserved constitutional right to regulate in their own way their internal policy, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States. It is a bill to punish treason without trial or conviction; a bill to confiscate private property without adequate compensation; in short, a bill to reconstruct States and make State constitutions, when in truth no States or their constitutions have been destroyed, or need reconstruction, unless by the voluntary action of their own people.

Where, sir, is the power in the Federal Government to do all these things? Where the power to make a State, known as such to the Constitution and laws of the United States, a province or Territory of the United States, and to govern it as such, in defiance of the laws of such State not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States? Where the power to put a State, not in rebellion nor disobedient to the Constitution, under military duress for indefinite years, until you force its people to remodel their constitution, not in itself anti-republican nor in any sense unconstitutional, and make it conform to the changeable will of a Federal Congress? Sir, there is no such power but in usurpation and physical force. This bill is in every element revolutionary, and had the issue now made by it with the slaveholding States been made with them on the 4th of March, 1861, and an attempt made then, as now, to enforce it by war, no man who is capable of distinguishing between the rhapsodies of fanatical abolitionists and the plain provisions of the Federal Constitution would hesitate to say that the people of the southern States whose rights were thus assailed would have been justified in resisting such conditions to the extremity of revolution.

Mr. Speaker, Congress cannot make a State, nor a State constitution, nor destroy either. Once a State in the Union, always so, until consent or successful force permanently takes it out. The people of a State, in the largest sense of the term, are the State, and they make its constitution; and to be their constitution in any just sense of the term it must be their free act, not the result of coercion or duress in any form. When this free action has been had, then the only essential conditions of a State constitution in its relations to the United States are that it should be republican in form and in harmony with the Constitution of the United States. What, for example, made the State of South Carolina a State of the Federal Union? The Constitution of the United States and the consent of the people of South Carolina; and nothing but the same power, except successful revolution, can unmake her. That revolution is not accomplished, and therefore South Carolina is in the Union, and the power over her constitution in the hands of her people, who can do with it what they please, except make it contrary to the Constitution of the United States; that they cannot do, and when they attempt to make it thus contrary it is void in all those things wherein it is contrary; in all else it is good. Four elements at least are involved in the idea of a State government: 1. A defined territory. 2. The people occupying it. 3. Functions, or a form or system of government. 4. An administration, or officers or functionaries to carry on the government. In a constitutional sense it is absurd to say a Federal State may be partly out of the Union and partly in; its territory out, its people in; its territory and people in, its government out. Officers, functionaries, are not, in its full sense, the government. The life of the government is not in them, but is manifested through them. Suspension of action, or void action by the functionaries of a State government, is not the death of the State. State officers may commit suicide; a majority of the people may commit suicide; the State has not therefore committed suicide. Usurpation or overthrow of a Federal State government by the confederate State government, even with the consent of a majority of the people, is not the death of the Federal State. The usurped or overriding power being removed, the lawful Federal State government revives of its own inherent life and becomes the law of the people until they constitutionally and lawfully change it. Every officer of a State may die, resign, refuse to act, desert his State, or turn traitor; is the State therefore dead? It is not. The substance, the body of the State, its territory, its people, its organic law, remain. The functionaries may be gone, but the functions of government are not gone. Suspension of rights, non-exercise of rights, either voluntary or by coercion, or misfeasance, or malfeasance in a State having elements of sovereignty, do not involve destruction of sovereign rights, much less extinction of the Federal State. The State exists and the rights revive when the suspending or disturbing cause is removed. It would relieve the minority in this House from much embarrassment, and save them perhaps from false charges of factious opposition to Administration measures, if the President and his friends here would agree among themselves and clearly define to us the principles on which they propose to deal with the States in rebellion. Are those States out of the Union, or in it? Is their territory foreign territory or not? Are the powers you and the President are assuming to exercise over them powers of conquest or powers under the Constitution? Is the plan, either in principle or in detail, embraced in this bill, a plan "wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution," or inside of and known to it?

For my part I cannot understand the doctrine of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Eliot,] by which a State is at the same time in the Union and out of it; a State and not a State; at once a State and a Territory; a State in the Union to be governed and out of the Union to be disfranchised and punished. A State in my idea is an entirety; a body-politic, not several bodies-politic; one sovereignty, qualified and limited, it is true, but yet one sovereignty, not many. Members of the State may be disjointed and perish, but the State remains one body, either in the Union or out of it.

The doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens,] that the States in rebellion are in fact and in law out of the Union, is at least consistent if not sound. It is a doctrine entirely consistent with the independence of the southern confederacy, an idea which we have repudiated at the cost of seas of blood. If the rebellious States are in the Union, under the Constitution, and in a legal sense there is no other Union, they are there as States, with all their constitutional rights as such unimpaired; the war power can touch only their claims of right not constitutional. If they are out of the Union, but subject to our power over them as their conquerors in war, being conquered, their territory merges into the mass of national territory, and may be treated and governed as such; not, however, by an unlimited military discretion, but to the extent of the constitutional power of the Federal Government over its Territories; not otherwise.

But, sir, on this question of the relations of the revolutionary States to the Federal Government I accept the doctrines of President Lincoln in his inaugural of March 4, 1861, and have only to regret that after so clear and sound a statement of constitutional law and good intentions, the President has since, in direct conflict with his own teaching and oath, "come to the same conclusion" with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens.]

The President, on the 4th day of March, 1861, among many other things which it cannot now be pleasant for him or his admirers to refer to, said:

"I take my official oath to-day with no mental reservations, and with no purpose to construe the Constitution or laws by any hypercritical rules."

He further said:

"I hold that in contemplation of universal law, and of the Constitution, the union of these States is perpetual."

He further said:

"It follows from these views that no State, upon its own mere motion, can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void; and that acts of violence within any State or States against the authority of the United States are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances."

He further said:

"I therefore consider that in view of the Constitution and the laws, the union of these States is unbroken, and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States."

This is the only theory consistent with the true constitutional idea that the Federal Union is a perpetual union of States, and that each State, as an individual member of the Union, has in itself the same element of perpetuity that belongs to the aggregate Republic formed by that Federal union of States. The Union can be held to be perpetual only on the principle that the States composing it are perpetual corporations or bodies-politic, and indestructible by any act of the aggregate body or by their own act; otherwise consolidation, not union, is the fundamental principle of the Federal Constitution; and this idea, the language, the spirit, the history of the Constitution, all repudiate. The States united cannot destroy a single State; power to do that is power to consolidate the States into one. A single State cannot destroy the Union; power to do that is power to secede; and neither consolidation nor secession are principles of the Union.

What, then, is to be done in the case of a State whose functions have been suspended or disturbed by rebellion or other force after the illegal force hostile to the United States and lawful State government has been overcome and removed, there being no State officers having right to exercise the functions of State government? Is the Federal Government to intervene and set up a new government, make a new constitution, as proposed in this bill? Not so. In the absence of lawful State functionaries, from whatever cause, the functions of State government revert to the people in their primary right, as the source of the government. The life, the vital powers of the State are in them, and all they have to do is, by concert of action, conformable so far as may be to the necessity of the case and the organic law of the State, to choose new functionaries, new officers, new Senators and Representatives in Congress, and thus set the dormant or suspended government again in motion in harmony with the Government of the United States. All this can be done without the initiative action, or cooperation, or even presence, of a single Federal officer within the State. The sovereignty of a State as to its internal affairs is in its people. The question of the recognition of that sovereignty, in any form in which it may be presented to the Federal Government for recognition, is a political, not a judicial question, and is not to be decided by abstract theories, but by the tests of the Constitution. No Federal act is indispensable to make a State government, reorganized by the people in the mode I have supposed, complete, except recognition by the proper political authority of the Federal Government, namely, the Congress; and the only proper inquiry is, "Is this government republican in form? Was it established by the people conformably to their own laws? Is it faithful to and in harmony with the Constitution of the United States?"

I will not say that facts may never exist to justify action by the Federal Government in harmony with and subordinate to the will of the people of the State, but they cannot justify it in dictating organic changes, when no conflict exists between the organic law of the State and the Constitution of the United States. The action of the Federal Government, in any extreme case justifying its intervention, must be subsidiary to State laws, not paramount to them. It cannot, as did General Banks, declare a State constitution and laws void unless the Constitution of the United States or laws passed pursuant to it make them void. The principle, the essential character, of this question is not changed, whether the temporary overthrow of the lawful State government arises from the acts of a foreign enemy or from internal or domestic violence. Can either destroy the constitutional government of the State, or destroy or wipe out its organic law or any part of it so as to leave the State a tabula rasa, whereon the Federal Government can write, or command the people of the State to write, what it pleases? If a foreign enemy or an internal revolutionary State government cannot thus destroy or change the lawful State government and constitution, by what right can the United States Government, having authority in the State only to protect lawful State and Federal authority, work such destruction or organic changes? To assume that it can is to assume that the United States, a Government of delegated and strictly limited powers, can either upon the occasion of a foreign war, or of rebellion in a State, by its own act, subvert its own Constitution, conquer its own territory, and overthrow its own constituent States.

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."—Constitution of the United States, art. 4, sec. 4.

Herein is claimed to be the constitutional warrant for this bill. What does it mean? What is the extent of the power? Who is to judge of the occasion and manner and measure of its exercise? The United States, the guarantor, agrees with each State, the guaranteee, that neither the United States, nor any one or more States, nor any other Power, shall ever overthrow republican government in any State. The guarantee is fundamental, and the very essence of the contract between the States in the Constitution, and irrevocable except by the assent of every State. The power to amend by three fourths of the States cannot reach it, for that is a power to amend, not to destroy; and if republican government be of the essence of our Federal system, to destroy republican government is to destroy the system itself.

The constitutional guarantee cannot be extended beyond its plain import. It was intended as a shield to the States, not as a sword against them—a power of protection, not of encroachment or aggression—the protection of republican forms of Government in the States, not the creation of such governments by the Federal authority, is the purpose of the guarantee. No one reserved State right can be divested by its exercise. Is the right to regulate its own domestic policy, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, a reserved right of each State? Who denies it? Is it consistent with the Constitution of the United States for a State government to declare that a negro or a woman shall not hold office, or vote, or be a juror in such State? It clearly is. The power so to declare is a reserved right of each State. Can Congress take it away? I might extend the inquiry to the entire class of subjects which, hitherto, and until the monomania of abolition and negro equality had seized the public mind, were regarded as within the reserved rights of the States, and ask, can Congress take them away? This bill says that it can. The Constitution of the United States, if it means anything, means that it cannot. If Congress can do what is proposed to be done by the twelfth section of this bill, it is hard to conceive what it cannot do in the way of dictating State constitutions and subverting State governments. Its power would admit of no limitation except in its own judgment of what might be for "the general welfare," and to concede to it that discretion would be to concede to it the omnipotence of the British Parliament, and to such a practical result have the dogmas of abolition led us.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Edgerton.

HO. OF REPS.

But admit that Congress may judge as to what is a republican form of government in a State, that judgment is not one of unlimited discretion, but is to be guided by the Constitution; what that recognizes as republican government is so, and no different rule of republicanism can be imposed by Congress until the Constitution itself is changed. This would seem to be too plain a proposition to admit of question.

What, then, is a State government republican in form? Is a slaveholding State such a government? Is a State not guarantying "freedom and equality of civil rights to all persons before the law" such a government? Beyond question it is, or may be; for a large majority of just such States, slaveholding States, made the Federal Union and Constitution, and protected slavery by express guarantees as a local relation or institution of States; and every functionary of the Federal Government is estopped by the Constitution itself, by judicial precedent, and by the uniform practice of the Government from avowing that a Federal State recognizing negro slavery is not or cannot be a republican State. To assert, then, that slavery and a republican form of government are incompatible, and that, therefore, the executive or legislative power of the United States—the Constitution being unchanged by amendment—have a right to declare that a State constitution and laws recognizing negro slavery are unconstitutional and void, is to assert a falsehood and an absurdity; and for the Federal Government, executive or legislative, to demand as a condition of recognition and protection to a State in its government that it shall abolish slavery, and to enforce such demand by military occupation and force, is usurpation and revolution on the part of the Federal Government, nothing less. This, sir, in my judgment, is the logic of the Constitution, and no specious arguments or florid rhetoric upon slavery, its wrongs or its dangers, can refute that logic. Before the law and logic of the Federal Constitution, the bill now before the House is revolutionary and void. If this is a revolutionary Congress, you have a revolutionary power to pass this bill; but if it be, as I am bound by my oath of office to believe and assert, a Congress sitting under the Constitution of the United States, and having no powers outside of or unknown to it, then you cannot constitutionally pass this bill.

But the question involved is not one of power alone. It is also one of policy, of expediency, of magnanimity—a great question, appealing not only to the calmest judgment of the people but to the best and noblest feelings of their hearts, and among these, sir, I include the sympathies which spring from identity of race and kindred blood. We, sir, are white men, exercising the powers of a Government made by white men, and our first duty is to use those powers for the benefit of white men and their posterity forever. Our duty to our own race is kindred to our duty to our own families. True charity begins at home.

Mr. Speaker, the question most important to the people of the United States and to this Congress is, how soonest to restore peace and union with the constitutional rights of every State unimpaired; for, sir, there can be small hope of permanent peace without union, and that will be no union in the sense of the Constitution into which any State, shorn of its equality and sovereignty, shall be dragged at the chariot wheels of military conquest. Consent, free consent, not force, made the Union of these States, and free consent is the only honorable and just agency that can secure its permanent restoration. With whatever abhorrence I may look upon the southern revolution and its consequent evils to the whole country,

I could not without pain behold the Representatives of conquered and degraded States coming to our doors to—

"Bend low, and in a bondman's key,
With bated breath and whispering humbleness"

sue for admission here. Let that spectacle of the degradation of American States, our constitutional coequals in rights and sovereignty, be spared to the American people and to the nations of the earth. Magnanimity is an element in the highest statesmanship. Like mercy, to which it is kindred—

"It becomes

The throned monarch better than his crown."

We can afford to be magnanimous; we can afford to spare the people of the southern States, even if they were absolutely conquered and had laid down their arms and we had full power over them, the humiliation of reconstruction upon the principles and in the ways indicated by the bill now before the House.

Mr. Speaker, we have tried four years of disunion and civil war. Destruction, desolation, political and social demoralization have marked the whole progress of the war. It has shaken our political fabric to the loosening of its very cornerstones. In the wild delirium of their passion the American people have made war on each other as the fabled Titans warred. We have rushed into fields of blood as if we felt upon us "the thews of Anakim," and within us "the pulses of a Titan's heart." The whole action of the body-politic for the last four years has been abnormal and spasmodic. The cry has been blood, blood, when all through this fearful ordeal of passion the great want of the nation has been statesmanship, not blood; wise men, rather than destroying armies. The war has brought no beneficent results that statesmanship could not better have achieved. We may endeavor to trace in the bloody track of war the ways and footsteps of the benign Deity whom we have dethroned as the Prince of Peace, in order to enthrone him as the God of Battles; but, sir, we will search in vain in the past or future for compensation for the appalling evils of the war. The judgment of history will be that the last four years have been years of dishonor, not of true glory to the American people. Priding ourselves upon our intelligence, our Christianity, our freedom, our power, and boasting of a system of constitutional government adapted by its self-adjusting power of amendment to cure its own defects and perpetuate itself without revolution, but turning infidels to our own self-imposed law, we have waded in slaughter, because we could not agree as to the character and limitations of our own constitution of government. No question of dynastic succession, no question of religious faith, no fact of intolerable oppression, such as in other countries and ages made revolutions and civil wars, carried us into war. We have fought like demons when we should have taken counsel together and argued and voted like intelligent and patriotic freemen.

Mr. Speaker, the people want peace. The public welfare demands peace. The time for peace is near at hand—if wisdom fail us not now, as it failed us in the beginning of the war. The bad passions, and I may say the bad men, that provoked and began the war, have well-nigh run their course and spent their fury. Reason, and the patriotism that embraces the whole country, not sections alone, nor States alone in the fold of its love, are again assuming mastery. Notwithstanding the clouds that have temporarily obscured them, signs elsewhere, if not in this House, are not unhopeful of the near inauguration of the power of conciliation which looks to reason rather than to force—to kind charities rather than malign passions as an agency for peace and union.

Conciliation, which involves the postponement or at least the subordination of the question of slavery and all its collateral issues between the contending States to the higher question of the Constitution and the Union, has from the beginning of the war been a prominent feature in the policy of the Democratic party toward the people of the southern States. It has subjected us to gross misrepresentation and to unmeasured vituperation, and in many individual cases to oppression and outrage; but, sir, it was a policy dictated by the best impulses of the heart, demanded by the Constitution, and justified by the experience of history. It was clearly indicated in the Crittenden resolution of July, 1861, and all parties in Congress then approved it and the people accepted it. It was clearly stated in the Chicago resolutions of August last, and in the public letters of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency. This policy of conciliation was not adhered to and carried out by the President and Congress, and under the influence of the passions of war it failed to receive an approving vote of a majority of the people in the election of November last; but it is nevertheless entitled to the respect due to the convictions of a minority of one million eight hundred thousand free electors in the United States, whose fidelity to their country, however aspersed, history will indicate. This policy, sir, of conciliation is the only policy upon which peace can be made without degradation and dishonor to men whom it is neither our right nor our interest to degrade, or expatriate, or destroy; it is the only policy that will permanently heal the gaping wounds of war, and leave no rankling hate to fester into gangrene in the body-politic.

Mr. Speaker, the abstract question of right or wrong between the northern and southern States, or the question of negro slavery, is not the whole question in our case when we come to treat of peace, or to discuss measures in the interest of peace. Slavery is not the subject on which we took up arms, and it is not the chief question to be settled. We cannot make peace on that naked issue. We cannot without crime carry on the war until the theory of absolute justice to the negro is realized. Absolute justice, absolute right, are things unattainable in any human society, for the reason that the Divine ruler of the world has not so constituted man nor ordered human affairs as to make them attainable. Revolutions, political contests, civil wars, have never fully realized any abstract theories of right or of perfect Commonwealths. This war will not realize them. Philosophers may speculate over such theories and picture imaginary Utopias, but the stern logic of history, the incorrigible perversities of man's nature blow the air-painted pictures to the winds.

"The earth hath bubbles as the water hath,
And these are of them."

Holding these views of the character of the war and of the policy and means that will soonest end it, the bill before us, in my judgment, is not a measure for peace, it is not a measure for union, it will not aid to restore and reënthrone in the hearts of the people the broken and dishonored Constitution. It embodies a spirit and purpose toward the southern people which, if impolitic and vindictive one year ago, when the bill first came before the House, and when our enemy was far stronger and more defiant than now, is still more impolitic and vindictive at this time, when the minds of all good men are searching diligently for ways of reconciliation and peace.

Mr. Speaker, the opinions and fears of the southern people that the Republican party when it obtained control of the Federal Government by the election of 1860 would not stop short of the total obliteration of slavery in the United States, and a remodeling of the whole domestic policy of the slaveholding States, were not groundless. The logic of the abolition party, the logic of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward, and of all others who for the sake of political power accepted the dogmas and acquired the animus of the radical abolitionists, inexorably demanded the immolation of negro slavery. It has come, sir, and by and by it will be for us and our posterity to count the cost and sum up our and their gains. The war, provoked by an intemperate zeal to dry up or blot out what Mr. Seward once termed "the mean and miserable rivulet of black African slavery," has only hastened and made us to realize, with fearful cost of blood and wealth and human happiness, a result that was as certain otherwise to come in God's own time peacefully, through the inevitable workings of a free constitution of government, as the stars are certain to move in their courses according to the laws of their being.

No greater absurdity was ever imposed upon a deluded people than the idea continually dwelt upon by the radical abolitionists that slavery was encroaching upon freedom, and that there was danger that the Union would become all slave. It was not, sir, the idea of a statesman or of a large-minded patriot. The spirit of the Constitution, the instinct of the American people, the physical characteristics of the country, the laws of political economy, the statistics of our national development, the very laws of human progress, were all against such an idea; and if anything in our past political history gave encouragement to it it was removed by the much-traded Kansas and Nebraska act of 1854. There was, sir, in that act a principle which laid the ax at the root of the tree of African slavery on this continent; it was the principle of American Democracy, the democratic principle of the right of the people to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, as well in Territories as in States. It removed the Missouri Compromise line from the national territory, and opened to the superior activity and vigor of free institutions the territory south of the Missouri line, which had, by the Missouri act of 1820, been tacitly set apart for slave States. It left freedom and slavery to fight out their battle on neutral ground, and who shall doubt on which side the victory would rest? If any proof were wanting that the Kansas and Nebraska act of 1854 was one in the interest of free institutions it may be found in the fact that the author and ablest advocate of that act, Stephen A. Douglas, was politically crucified by southern men because he would not cooperate in nor approve their schemes to defeat the intent and spirit of the law by carrying slavery by force and fraud into the constitution of the new State of Kansas. When the Federal Government itself by the act of 1854 had cut loose from political intervention with slavery all that true and intelligent friends of free States had to do was to cease agitation of slavery as a question of national politics, trust to the peaceful, healthy action of the Constitution, and the progressive vitality of free institutions, and abide their time. "The mean and miserable rivulet of black African slavery" would have disappeared, leaving perhaps stains, but no fearful rents nor scars upon the body-politic.

But it was otherwise ordered. The suicidal effort at secession afforded to the zealots of anti-slavery a pretext for making direct and open war upon slavery with all the power, material and political, they had acquired by the election of 1860, and they at once adapted their theories and plans to the changed relations which secession had produced. The sagacious mind of Mr. A. H. Stephens clearly foresaw and foreshadowed this result in his speech against secession to the Georgia convention, when he warned the convention that the consequence of their unwise and impolitic act of secession would be to destroy their hope of more slave States, and perhaps by it lose all, and have their last slave wrested from them by stern military rule, "or," as he said, "by the vindictive decree of a universal emancipation, which may reasonably be expected to follow."

On the 4th March, 1861, it is plain the mind of Mr. Lincoln, however imbued with anti-slavery ideas and the conviction of the necessity of abolition, had not thrown off the restraints of the Constitution. He was then even willing so far to ignore the doctrine of his speech of June 17, 1858, as to declare his assent to the amendment which had been proposed by Congress to the effect that no amendment to the Constitution should ever be made "to give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere within any State with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to service or labor under the laws of said State." Then the President believed he had not the power, and he declared he had not the inclination, to disturb slavery in the States. Then the war power had not developed itself to his mind nor been made precious to him by the habit and pleasure of its use.

So soon as it was apparent, after the beginning of civil war at Charleston, that the people of the North were prepared, for the sake of the Union under the Constitution, to meet the terrible ordeal of war, and to make force an element of its defense, the wily antagonists of slavery saw their opportunity and advanced the proposition which a majority of the people seem to have gradually accepted as a postulate: "Slavery is the cause and strength of the rebellion." This taken for granted, its consequences were plain: to destroy the rebellion, slavery must be destroyed; to restore the Union, slavery must be destroyed; to preserve the Constitution, slavery must be destroyed. This postulate and its consequences once accepted by the President and his party, it was not difficult to find in assumed war powers of the Executive and of Congress the instruments to do the perfect work of abolition in the rebellious States.

Mr. Speaker, the truth of the assertion that slavery is the cause and strength of the rebellion has never been apparent to my mind. It may be true that the rebellion would not have occurred when it did except for slavery; neither would it have occurred except for the success of the Republican party upon an anti-slavery policy. The real cause of the rebellion lies deeper than the fact of slavery. Not slavery alone, but the undue development and antagonism of two principles in the Federal system engendered practical infidelity to the Constitution; and from being infidels to the Constitution it was an easy transition for men to become its destroyers. From the foundation of the Government the principle of consolidation or centralization of power, tending in its extreme assertion to monarchy, and the democratic principle of State rights, or diffusion of power, tending in its extreme assertion to disintegration and anarchy, have fought peaceful political battles over the Federal Constitution with alternating success. I do not know that these two principles can better be characterized than by comparing them to the centripetal and centrifugal forces in the solar system, forces so evenly balanced in that system by the divine hand that they ever work together in harmony; but in our Federal political system they are subject to the disturbing influences of man's imperfect capacity to regulate his own moral and intellectual nature; subject, in brief, to man's imperfections.

So long as intelligence, patriotism, love of the Constitution, and mutual good-will between all the States ruled the Government, there was no occasion for the dangerous assertion of either Federal or State rights; the two differing theories or forces were practically harmless; they worked in harmony like the forces binding the sun and the planets in their appointed spheres. But when sectional interests and opinions became strongly antagonistic, and sectional jealousies grew to heart-burnings and hatred, the subject of slavery became the prominent one on which the antagonism of sections became most marked, and Massachusetts and South Carolina became representatives of ultra opinions on each side. Boston denounced the Constitution of the United States as "a league with hell," because of its protection of slavery, and resisted the fugitive slave law; while Charleston imprisoned Samuel Hoar, an honorable citizen of Massachusetts, for seeking to obtain justice for a kidnapped man of color, claimed to be a citizen of Massachusetts. With the strong antagonism and hatred between sections as represented in their extremes by the two States I have named, came the efforts of the stronger States, having a common interest and institutions, to work out their plans through the central Federal power, and the effort of the weaker section, having other common interests and institutions, to protect themselves by flying off or withdrawing from the Federal influence. Abolition in the North sought its ends through the principle of consolidation; the slaveholding, or rather cotton States, sought protection for their sectional interests, slavery included, in the disintegrating principle of secession. When sectional hostility is strong for whatever cause, the stronger party resorts to Federal power, the weaker falls back for defense on State rights. Massachusetts in 1814, hostile to the war of 1812 because of its effects on her commerce, took steps in the Hartford Convention toward rebellion and secession. South Carolina in 1832, aggrieved by the tariff of 1828, attempted nullification, and would have seceded except for the strong will and Federal power of Jackson, sustained by the public opinion of the nation. South Carolina in 1860, taking Massachusetts at her word, that the Constitution was "a covenant with death," and ought to be broken, tried to break it; but circumstances had then changed; and Massachusetts having the power to enforce the covenant of death, having Federal power on her side, stood by the Union and its bond, even to the extremity of wiping the people and name of South Carolina from the face of the earth. Sir, in the light of history the mutual criminations and recriminations of Massachusetts and South Carolina are painful to truthful and candid men. Mutual charity rather than mutual vituperation would become both.

In the sense in which I have stated it, sir, as a pretext for or an element of infidelity to the Constitution, is slavery a cause of the war, and not otherwise. If Massachusetts and the northern States had loved the Union and Constitution more than they hated slavery, there would have been no war; had South Carolina and the cotton States loved the Union and Constitution more than they hated New England and loved slavery, there would have been no war. State rights and Federal rights, the centrifugal and centripetal forces of the Federal system, would have worked harmoniously for centuries, and slavery have disappeared as the twilight melts into the perfect day. Men of both sections, sir, extreme abolitionists and extreme advocates of slavery, are responsible for and must bear the guilt, the moral guilt, of the rebellion.

As slavery is not in any just sense the cause of the war, neither is it the strength of the rebellion; on the contrary, sir, it has been its weakness and the cause of its failure. Slavery in this war has been to the southern States, when they leaned on it for support, a broken reed. Think you, sir, that if the seceded States, instead of three and a half million negro slaves, had had within their borders the same number of white persons with their proper proportion of such fighting men as have filled the southern armies for the last four years, the chances of the South for independence would not have been far greater and their military successes far greater than they have been? When the southern men, in their madness, laid their sacrilegious hands upon the ark of the Federal covenant, they doomed to death their institution of slavery, and lost their power of preserving their cherished dogma of State rights; and had the Federal Government during the war never done one act or written one line by way of edict or law touching slavery as an institution, slavery would have perished. The necessities of war, the contact and abrasion of war, would have worn it away; and it was an evil, nay a woeful, day when anti-slavery fanaticism, in order to destroy an institution already doomed to death in the house of its friends, broke down the safeguards and limitations of the Constitution, and made a federal republic substantially a consolidated empire whose very organic law has become the mere creature of executive will. Sir, the wisest men of the Administration party have not hesitated to say, and to say truly, that the issue with rebellion has been changed and its power invigorated by the radical anti-slavery policy, under whose pressure your President has conducted his administration. If southern armies have been conquered, sir, it has not been done by emancipation proclamations, or confiscation acts, or acts partitioning southern lands among negroes, nor by negro soldiers, but by such free-born young white men as their own brave, proud spirits and the military genius of McClellan trained into the heroes that smote the power of the rebellion at South Mountain and Antietam; such free-born young white men of our own Northwest, sir, as, under the leadership of Sherman, moved "still as the breeze, but dreadful as the storm," through the quaking heart of the southern confederacy from Atlanta to Savannah.

In my judgment, sir, not one victory has been gained, not one Union man made in the South, not one Federal dollar nor the life of one Union soldier saved, by making the war a war upon slavery rather than upon armed enemies of the Union; on the contrary, battles, lives, dollars, and priceless liberties have been lost by the efforts to abolish slavery by Federal power rather than to subdue rebellion. And in addition to all this, sir, the policy of negro elevation to an equality of social and political rights in this Republic with white men, its natural, and in the order of God its inevitable rulers, is the death-warrant of the African race among us, dooming it to gradual but certain extermination. As superior and inferior races, the Anglo-Norman and the negro may exist together in the same political State; but as equals they never can.

Under the blind infatuation of partisan passion, ignoring the most solemn pledges, and even truths, of human nature, the purpose and issue of the war have been changed on our part from defense of the Union and Constitution to the enforcement of the abandonment of slavery and the political elevation of negroes. That has been made the condition of peace, and the President and Congress have marked out the line by which they will travel to its realization. They have been fighting it out on that line for three years or more, until it runs in a river of blood. Have we reached the haven of peace? Ask the armies and navies still doing the work of death; ask the late order for the conscription of three hundred thousand more men, additional to the two million and more already offered to the Moloch of war. Have we saved the Union? Its fate still hangs trembling upon the ordeal of battle. Strength and victory seem now on our side, but the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. Have we saved the Constitution? Like a dishonored scroll it has been trampled under the feet of the President and Congress, and two million and more of voters who, but a few years ago, sang lo peans in its honor, now say "Amen" to its dishonor.

Few, sir, who witnessed it, will ever forget the scene of a few days ago, when the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] seemingly proud of his functions, officiated as high priest in this Hall while the Constitution of our country, the matchless work, and bearing the honored names of Washington, Franklin, Madison, Hamilton, and their illustrious compeers, was offered as a sacrifice upon the altar of the blood-stained demon of political abolition, and the wild shouts of a law-defying multitude rang from the crowded galleries to applaud the deed; and, sir, the majesty and dignity of the Constitution and the laws, represented in your place of honor and power, seemed to quail before the exultant shout of victorious partisans. But, sir, I ask again, have we by the war and its policy saved and protected the rights of the States—rights the maintenance of which inviolate were not long ago declared to be essential to the perfection and endurance of our political fabric of Federal Union? You who so declared on the 10th day of May, 1860, and your President, who so declared, under the solemnity of his inaugural oath, on the 4th day of March, 1861, now laugh your own declarations as well as the rights of the States to scorn. Has the war of abolition saved the lives and happiness of our own white race? Inquire of the countless dead, ask the desolated homes, commune with the widows and orphans, measure the sorrow of broken hearts, ask the maimed victims of the war, ask the millions to whom the war and its policy have brought poverty, sickness, wounds, sorrow, sin, and death. Have we lightened the burdens of the people? Have we, in the gilded phrase of your President, "lifted artificial weights from all shoulders?" Look at the appalling figures of our public debt, measuring well nigh four thousand million dollars, money more than enough to have bought and paid for every slave within the United States before the war began, and yet the arithmetic mountain of public debt grows without ceasing.

"Hills peep o'er hills, and Alps on Alps arise."

Ask the impoverished and desponding taxpayers, "Are your burdens light?" And ask, too, the contractors and manufacturers, the national bankers and fund mongers who are clothed in purple and fine linen, and whose eyes stand out with fatness from the wealth wrung from the hard hands of the people to feed the voracious appetite of war. Have we saved and protected the rights and liberties of our free-born white men? Ask martial law. Let the response come from the white slave of the conscription law driven into our Army, branded and chained like the galley-slave scourged to his dungeon, or sold into it as slaves are sold in open market. Question the writ of habeas corpus, suspended and denied its rights before the law; suspended and denied to white men, but by this bill extended and made active for the relief of freed negro slaves. Ask also your political prisons, teeming with the victims of despotic power, whose cry for right has but lately found listeners in this Hall. Ask innocent men and women time and again imprisoned and banished, without cause, without warrant, and without atonement or redress. Ask Magna Charta, which has for centuries guarded the humblest storm-shaken, wind-pierced cot on England's soil as sacredly as the palace of her proudest baron; ask Magna Charta if in the midst of the war of abolition free America protects the liberties of white men. Ask also public orators silenced, free presses suspended, peaceable assemblages of the people overawed or dispersed, courts of justice and trial by jury suspended by courts of military commission. Ask truckling, time-serving judges, who in the very sanctuaries of the law, in the very temples of public justice, are the ministers of her dishonor. Ask all these if the managers of the crusade for negro emancipation have saved and protected our rights as citizens and freemen before the law.

Have public and private virtue been promoted by the war of abolition? Ask this city, the metropolis of the nation, and a type of its morals, its manners, its civilization; ask the city of Washington, where licentiousness riots in high places and crowds the public ways; ask the thousands of hapless, ill-fated women, brought here by the exigencies of war to swell the tide of public demoralization; ask the plunderers of the public Treasury, of every grade, the cormorants and thieves that feed on the spoils of war.

Has the negro been made free? Let the hundreds of thousands yet dwelling in their house of bondage answer. Has the freed negro been made happier and better? Ask the one fourth of the slaves of the South who, like the moth that courts the flame that kills it, or the Hindoo devotees crushed by the idol they adore, have rushed to the Federal flag and fallen into the wake of the victorious armies of emancipation, and there, starving, diseased, helpless, have found liberty to die! Ask the dead negroes of the war, and the tens of thousands of their race doomed also in like ways to perish. Finally, sir, in summing up the gains and blessings of this war of abolition and secession, ask the invaded, impoverished, blood-drenched, war-scarred, desolated South, and its maddened, desperate people, to tell us what they are!

Sir, in answer to all these questions there come to us, borne on the four winds of heaven, myriads of mournful voices pleading in the name of the Union, the Constitution, and our common country—yea, in the name of humanity itself—for an end of war, and for the spirit, the arguments, and the blessings of peace.

In the policy of this bill, in the policy of your constitutional amendment, in the policy of your party, in the policy hitherto adopted by the President, there is no basis nor hope for peace to the southern people without dishonor; and who, sir, would not say "Death before dishonor?"

If I may presume to counsel this Administration and Congress, I would say, make no condition of peace but Union, on the basis of the Federal Constitution, as the fathers of the Republic made it, and as it was interpreted for seventy-one years of matchless national honor and prosperity. Cease to press emancipation, either by executive edicts, congressional legislation, or the coercive power of constitutional amendment. Emancipation will come; but, mindful of the wise words of your own President that "gradual not sudden emancipation is better for all," trust the people of all the States concerned with the question of emancipation, and, with the experience of the past, they, after peace is restored, will deal with it and its consequences upon the social and political condition of the negro better than we can now. Repeal your confiscation laws and your acts and efforts to seize and parcel out southern lands. Restore rights and franchises vindictively seized. Stop all your arbitrary and vindictive proceedings, and grant an amnesty to all political offenders, making no test of loyalty but fidelity to the Constitution. Show your readiness to restore constitutional State rights and the disturbed balance of the Federal system. Do all these things, and you will shake the southern confederacy from its center to its corner-stone; you will bring a power to bear against it more potent than armies and navies; you will save lives, wealth, and constitutional liberty; you will make a permanent peace, resting upon its surest base, a Union restored and a Constitution honored in the hearts of all the people.

It is to my mind no answer to such counsel as this to refer to the late abortive effort at negotiation for peace. When all the facts are known we can better judge of the true design and character of that effort. So far as they are known by the official reports from either side, I cannot commend the action of the President of the United States, however much I condemn the course of Jefferson Davis. It is evident that the desire for peace and union was in the hearts of the confederate envoys, and a grand opportunity was offered and lost to Mr. Lincoln to have opened the door for reunion, by simply indicating that his radical policy of negro emancipation and elevation by Federal action should not stand in the way of peace.

For one, sir, I never expect the present rulers of the two warring sections to make peace, except at the end of a war of exhaustion. Both Lincoln and Davis are the unyielding advocates of the extreme sectional dogmas that have divided the Union. If the people want peace they will have it through their own spontaneous demand for it, and not because the men in whom they have placed the powers of Government will lead the way to peace. Their efforts have been to pull the sections asunder, not to unite them. When both these men shall indicate a willingness to treat for peace on the basis of the constitutional Union, I will believe they want peace, and not before. When Mr. Lincoln talks of peace on the basis of union, he means not the Union as the Constitution made it, but the Union as he would have it; that is, a Union wherein his usurping and arbitrary edict of emancipation shall be made a part of its organic law; and so long as his union and not the constitutional Union is made the ultimatum to the southern people, they will contend for independence and separation, and there will be no peace short of their subjugation or extermination. If the rebellion has the advantage of "a changed issue," let him be held responsible who, in the face of violated pledges, has made that issue with it.

Sir, if Mr. Lincoln were truly wise and patriotic, he would give no heed to the extreme demands of southern leaders for peace on the basis of separation and the recognition of the southern confederacy. They are usurpers, not rightful rulers; they are not the southern people. But, abandoning all the collateral issues he has himself unwisely raised, and which have made the southern people a desperate unit against the Union, he would return to the only true issue upon which we had a right to appeal to arms, as indicated in the resolution of Congress in July, 1861, and on that issue, and that only, appeal from the leaders of the South to the southern people themselves. That there was, and still may be, a basis for such an appeal, is proved by the testimony of Mr. Lincoln himself.

In his message of July 4, 1861, he said:

"It may well be questioned whether there is to-day a majority of the legally qualified voters of any State, except, perhaps, South Carolina, in favor of disunion. There is much reason to believe that the Union men are the majority in many, if not in every other one of the so-called seceded States. The contrary has not been demonstrated in any one of them. It is ventured to affirm this even of Virginia and Tennessee."

What, sir, has changed this Union majority into the desperate disunion men who for nearly four years past have time and again defied our power and defeated our armies? I answer, in the language of the leading public press of the South, the Richmond Enquirer, which speaking for the southern people, and contrasting the democratic Union policy of McClellan with the abolition policy of Lincoln, says:

"His (McClellan's) policy was the olive-branch in one hand and the sword in the other, to conquer by power and conciliate by kindness. It was a dangerous policy for us; for if the ameliorating hand of Federal kindness had softened the rigors of war, our people would not have been subjected to those terrible fires of suffering by which Mr. Lincoln has hardened every heart and steeled every sentiment against our merciless foes."

"We hailed the proclamations of emancipation and consecession and the policy of plunder and devastation as sure pledges of our ultimate triumph; they were terrible ordeals, but they most effectually eradicated every sentiment of union; and arousing the pride as well as the interest of our people, infused the patriotism of the whole, until they would have accepted death as preferable to ultimate defeat."

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the deluge of blood that has covered the land has lasted long enough. The sword, the symbol of vengeance and of power, has well-nigh done its work. If Christian statesmanship cannot restore the Union, war cannot. If the Union cannot be restored without the extermination or expatriation of the white people of eleven Federal States, it is time to estimate the value of the Union and the character of the Union after a war of extermination has done its work; it is time to estimate the value of peace when we have made a desert and a solitude of the fairest portion of our country and called them peace. It is time for all thoughtful and patriotic men to consider whether such a Union and peace will be worth the cost in lost life, lost wealth, lost liberty, lost human happiness. The tendency, nay the swift movement of the present disorder of affairs, is to military despotism, to monarchical power. For one, sir, when the issue shall be squarely made, as it will ere long be made, under the policy and the war of this Administration, a separation of the sections, with preserved constitutional liberty and the sovereignty of the States preserved to each section, or a war of absolute subjugation or extermination of States, to end in military and monarchical despotism over the whole Union, I will accept all the evils of separation rather than welcome the degradation and the burdens of despotic power. It is better for a nation to lose a portion of its territory than to lose its constitutional liberties.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to no man in my love for the Union, or in my reverence for the Constitution. Disunion of our Federal States is a dire evil to contemplate under any circumstances, but I can see evils in possible, nay, probable, results of the war conducted in a spirit of revenge, and without regard for constitutional rights, that are more to be feared than disunion itself. When the Union shall have ceased to protect that for which it was formed, the rights of the people and of the republican States, through which the people have formed and are represented in the Union, it is time for the Union itself to pass away and for its epitaph to be written.

Mr. Speaker, the anti-slavery party is in power. We know it; we feel it. It has not scrupled, while assuming a high mission from Heaven to regenerate this Republic, "to wade through slaughter to a throne." It is enthroned. Its foot seems to be upon the neck of its foe. With the eagerness of the exultant Shylock, polluting even the tribunal of justice with the spirit of revenge, it whets its knife "to cut the forfeiture" from the heart of its enemy. The Congress of the United States, the legislative power of the Union, and the Constitution, is asked by this bill to be the minister and executioner of the great revenge of section upon section, States North upon States South. For one, sir, I wash my hands of the deed.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES W. NYE, OF NEVADA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 22 and 23, 1865,

On the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the best return that I can make for the courtesy exhibited toward me on this occasion will be to discuss with as much brevity as possible the question before the Senate. I congratulate you, sir, and the country that we are able at last to turn our eyes a little from the present, and looking toward the commercial future, secure the legislation likely to be necessary for it. It is also matter of congratulation that we have now made such advances in our national struggle as to be able to cast around us and see what measures are necessary to promote the future honor and future glory of our country. We have manfully grappled with the present; we have won in the conflict, and it now becomes the duty of all, and especially of legislators, to see what the future of our country requires for its further and full development. We have, happily for the people of this land, arrived at a period when it is entirely safe to turn our attention to subjects and concerns that relate to a time of peace; a time, thanks to our brave soldiers and sailors, not distant or difficult to be foreseen.

I was a little surprised to hear the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] state that this was a question of little importance, that it was simply a question arising between two corporations of one of the States of this Union. If I understand the measure under consideration this is by no means a fair presentation of it. I understand this question to involve the regulation of the internal commerce of our entire country.

The question involved is one of power in Congress, and arises out of that provision in the Constitution which provides that Congress shall "regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." What construction this subdivision of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution shall receive at the hands of Congress is the only question involved in the proposed measure. From this standpoint alone I will discuss it. I have closed my ears and shall keep them closed to everything less or other than this. I shall refer to States and State interests only as such reference becomes necessary to demonstrate the correctness of my propositions or vindicate the truth of what I assert. In this reference I shall carefully abstain from saying anything that should occasion offense to a State. I have no quarrel with the State of New Jersey, through whose territory this chartered monopoly runs its railroad and canal, and I have no quarrel with Maryland, which State, I believe, has granted a charter similar in its general character and effect to the charter granted by New Jersey to the Camden and Amboy railroad. For these States, as for all the States, I entertain the strongest fraternal affection, but when they or any of the States attempt by legislation to block up the pathway of national progress, or pass limitations upon trade and commerce, I shall ever be found, as I am found to-day, advocating the power and the duty of Congress to save the external and internal commerce of the country from any fetters attempted to be imposed upon it by State regulation, whether the attempt proceed from State pride or State cupidity.

The question before the Senate is not one of favor to or that concerns a particular State. It is one of universal concern. It is whether Congress has the right to regulate the internal commerce of the nation. It is most singular that this question should be the subject of discussion. The language of the Constitution upon the point, and which I have just cited, is so plain that he who runs may read, and he only misunderstand who is perversely resolved to misconstrue it. The power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations is admitted upon all hands; no one pretends that any State, whether sea-board or inland, shares in this prerogative. It is conceded to be the sole right of Congress. Now, the power of Congress over the subject of commerce between the several States of the Union is derived from the self-same source, and the language that confers the power is as unambiguous as that which vests the regulation of foreign commerce in Congress, and it may with equal propriety be claimed in one case as in the other that the States have sole or concurrent jurisdiction.

The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] to whose opinions I have for long years deferred, and whose opposing opinion I now purpose with great diffidence to examine, will pardon me when I say that the propositions he argued do not come up to the magnitude of the real question which is involved. Upon several of the propositions argued by him I have no doubt. I grant at once the right of a State to regulate its internal commerce, and to place restrictions and limitations upon the trade its own citizens carry on between themselves. Over all matters of a purely local character the State has exclusive authority. With these Congress cannot, and I am sure has no disposition to interfere, but of matters partly local and partly national or wholly national Congress has unquestionable jurisdiction. The difficulty with the position of the honorable Senator from Maryland is he has argued upon a state of facts which has no relation to the subject under debate. The question before us is not what Congress may not do, but what it can do, and as a corollary of this, what it ought to do. The question is not whether the General Government can compel a State to construct as an original work a railroad or canal, or an ordinary highway, either for the convenience of its own citizens or the convenience of the citizens of other States, nor is it a question of the appropriation of public moneys or credit for the construction of a public improvement. The question here, simply stated, is whether a State having constructed within her borders any artificial channel of trade and communication, and having dedicated it to the public use, and the public having used it as a means of transit for men and merchandise, the State can impose restrictions upon such transit in favor of her own citizens, and thereby embarrass commerce between the citizens of her sister States. Sir, it is due to the great men who framed the national Constitution to say that they grasped in their contemplation the grand future of the country, and provided for what they saw the nation must one day become. They perceived then that inter-State commerce must be preserved from inter-State jealousies and conflicts, in order that the national growth might not be prevented by sectional interest or strife. It was to prevent this grand question of inter-State commerce from degenerating into what the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] calls a quarrel between two rival corporations, that the fathers considered it not only discreet but indispensable that the sole power to regulate commerce should be confided to Congress; and what is asked of us to-day is that Congress shall exert her constitutional supremacy upon a subject within its exclusive legislation, and that the channels of public trade shall be as free as the air we breathe.

If, sir, it be conceded that Congress has alone the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, does not the concession involve a surrender of all that is claimed adversely to the bill under consideration? Does commerce change or become something else because it is inter-State? Is it any less commerce when it is carried on between the Indian tribes and us than when carried on between other nations and ourselves? Does its transfer from natural to artificial channels of transit alter its real character? If it does not, then it appears to me that the argument of the honorable Senator from Maryland and of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire falls short of meeting the question. Now, sir, it is undeniable that much the largest part of our commerce is inter-State, and is carried over and upon the artificial means of transit provided by the ingenuity and industry of the people; and to regulate this trade was one of the objects of the constitutional provision. It was enacted to prevent an endless repetition of the jarring and jangling that continually occurred during the Confederation of the States, and was intended to nationalize commerce, and place it within the care and power of the General Government.

Sir, this question is not a new one. It engaged the attention of the learned of our country at a very early day. I call the attention of the Senate to a time when the rule for which I am contending was laid down and enforced under circumstances which give it peculiar significance and interest; the time when the immortal Fulton had completed his great steam experiment; the time when theory was reduced to practice, and Fulton had invoked to the use of man a power stronger than tides or currents; the time when favoring winds were no longer necessary to prosperous voyages, and when distance was robbed of nearly all its terrors. The great discoverer lived in the State of New York, that noble, magnanimous empire, whose people love to honor and reward eminent services; and to mark her appreciation of the great benefaction of Fulton she gave to him and to Mr. Livingston, who furnished him with the pecuniary means he needed to carry out his designs, the exclusive right to navigate the waters of the bay of New York and the Hudson river.

This munificent grant was subsequently impeached on the ground that the privilege was not in the power of the State to bestow, and that the legislation of New York trenching upon a right which was within the exclusive control of the General Government. Application was made to the Federal judiciary, and the question of the right of New York to reward Fulton, as I have stated, was presented for final adjudication to the Supreme Court. Chief Justice Marshall, renowned as much for his justice as his learning, declared that large as was the debt due to Fulton not only from New York but from the nation and the world, the form in which the State of New York expressed her gratitude was a violation of a provision of the national Constitution, and on this ground alone the great jurist declared the grant to Fulton was void. Strangely enough, and most striking as a coincidence, the application to set the grant aside was made by a citizen of New Jersey, who, owning a little vessel named the Bellona, thought himself as good as Fulton, and greater than all the Cæsars. New York was balked of her magnanimity, and Fulton deprived of his reward upon the prayer of a Jerseymen, who, standing upon the exclusive right of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, demanded what was nominated in the constitutional bond! Sir, New Jersey to-day has no right to complain when New Yorkers, standing upon the same identical ground, make, as against New Jersey, the same identical demand.

But we are gravely told that this is a question simply between two rival corporations. This cannot be so; but if it were it is not the first time that great principles have been raised and settled upon motives not half so great as the principles themselves. At all events, the question is before the Senate for its decision, and action must be had upon it without respect to corporations or corporators, if they stand in the way of the constitutional rights of others.

The opponents of this bill inquire what necessity there is for Congress now to legislate on this subject. Sir, the necessity is pressing and apparent. For the last four years we have been reaping in tears what we sowed in folly and wickedness. Our willful refusal truly to learn and boldly to state the dividing line between the rights of the nation and the rights of the States has had much to do with the rebellion that has filled our land with grief and cost us so much of blood and treasure. I had hoped the old doctrine of State sovereignty, of which so much has been said here and elsewhere, would not be revived, at least while the din of conflict and smoke of war reached our ears and eyes. I had supposed this monstrous fallacy died with the great political party which sailed under its malign star almost into the vortex of treason. It certainly must have no resurrection at the hands of Union Senators.

The honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. TEN Eyck,] by way of confession and avoidance, says that if the granting of the charter to the Camden and Amboy railroad, which it is alleged will be interfered with should this bill pass, was an imposition upon the people of the State of New Jersey, it was a self-imposed burden. This is very well as far as it goes, but it does not reach the difficulty. I complain not upon behalf of New Jersey. I am her challenger not her defender in this. I protest against her legislating upon a subject over which she has no jurisdiction. This is the gravamen of her offense. The citizens of that little and plucky State are represented here by honorable Senators whose duty it is to see to what particularly concerns her; but let me tell my excellent friend I am not blind to a fact which he has himself admitted, that a large portion of the citizens of that State are bitterly opposed to the Camden and Amboy monopoly, and that their opposition reflects credit upon their sagacity and patriotism.

I said, sir, that the necessity that called for the action of Congress upon the bill now under discussion was pressing and apparent. In proof of this, let me take a glance at the amount of our inter-State commerce. The tonnage that comes into New York from the West and the East is more than quadruple all of our external commerce; that is to say, our home commerce exceeds our trade with foreigners in the proportion of four to one. Now, the State of New Jersey sustains a peculiar geographical relation to the rest of the country. On her east is the metropolis of the nation, the great city that numbers its population by millions, the type of our common prosperity, and the receiving and distributing reservoir of the nation's wealth. On her west is Pennsylvania with her splendid capital. Her own entire length is about a hundred miles. The great West is obliged to traverse her territory in order to get to the sea. Her soil is a part of the national highway. Shall she be allowed to obstruct, in any manner or to any extent, this highway of the people? Shall she exact a penalty from travelers who cross her borders, and put the advantage derived from the extortion in the pockets of her own citizens? And yet this is what New Jersey is doing to-day, and has been doing since 1832; and to break this up, and restore the guarantees of the Constitution, is one of the objects of the bill before the Senate. The Camden and Amboy charter was granted in 1830. In 1831 the monopolists procured a legislative amendment of it. This amendment provided, among other things, that when any other railroad for the transportation of passengers and property between New York and Philadelphia, across New Jersey, should be constructed and used for that purpose, under any law of the State itself, or of the United States, authorizing or recognizing said road, that then the dividends which the Camden and Amboy railroad had stipulated to pay New Jersey for their charter, should be no longer payable to the State, and that the stock also paid to the State for the same purpose should be retransferred to the company. It will be thus seen that no hardship is to be experienced by these monopolists if the bill before the Senate becomes a law. Very early in their corporate existence the monopolists guarded themselves against the ill consequences of what they foresaw must inevitably occur, and both the State of New Jersey and the monopolists have joined in a cognovit of the power of Congress to do what the advocates of this bill are striving to have done.

I repeat here, sir, that the necessity which calls for our action is pressing and apparent. Let me cite facts and figures for our information and guidance. And in the first place, is not that a strange rule by which a railroad company charges its through passengers more than it charges its way passengers? This is the rule that prevails with the Camden and Amboy monopolists. Inquiring for the reason of the rule, we find that it is designed to tax passengers of other States whose business or pleasure takes them across her borders more in proportion for transit than is paid or required from citizens of New Jersey, passing from place to place within her lines. So, too, with the price she exacts compared with the rates of charges of other railroads. The monopolists charge three dollars for carrying you from New York to Philadelphia, a distance of ninety miles. From New York to Albany, a distance of one hundred and fifty-two miles, at least two lines of railroads carry passengers at the rate of three dollars per head. Senators who will take the trouble to pursue the comparison will find that this Camden and Amboy Company charge for the transit of passengers nearly twice as much as any other railroad corporation outside of New Jersey. The citizens of New Jersey pay one and forty-seven hundredths cent per mile transit to the Camden and Amboy road; the citizens of all the other States are obliged to pay to the same road for precisely the same accommodations over three cents per mile. For carrying freight across New Jersey the monopolists charge $7 40 per ton; more than is charged for carrying it from New York to Buffalo, a distance of some five hundred and forty miles. Last year, so the report of the company itself states, they carried six hundred and forty thousand through passengers. Sir, this makes $640,000 extracted from the pockets of the citizens of other States, illegally and unfairly extracted, and put into the pockets of citizens of New Jersey. Now, my objection is not that this corporation has made immense sums of money. I find no fault with this as such. My objection is not so much that New Jersey granted the exclusive privilege, and that this corporation have enjoyed its benefits until now, as that the time has come when the necessities of the nation imperatively demand that the monopoly should cease. How are we situated here in Washington to-day? I think it will be found on examination that this is the only capital that has not more than one avenue of approach to or retreat from it. Is it not most extraordinary that the exception should be the capital of the nation, the political center of the Republic, to which Senators and Representatives have to come from the Pacific coast and far-off Nebraska? Sir, I stood here in April, 1861, when by the burning of a single bridge over Gunpowder creek the capital was actually beleaguered, and the most painful and nervous apprehensions were felt throughout all the land lest the arch-rebel should put into execution his threat of wintering in Washington. This state of things is not only not wise, but discreditable and intolerable. It ought not to be endured an hour. The avenues of approach to this capital should be numbered by tens, instead of one, so that if an enemy seizes any of them, others and enough shall be left over and along which soldiers and supplies can be transported as occasion requires. These propositions are self-evident, and yet here lies New Jersey right across the pathway of the nation's necessities, giving herself no concern on the subject, and clamoring about what she calls the sacredness of her franchises. Washington may be invaded and destroyed, but not a citizen or a soldier can cross New Jersey to the relief of the capital, unless he consents to come in the way and at the time dictated by the Camden and Amboy railroad.

But my friend from New Jersey [Mr. TEN Eyck] says this monopoly will soon expire. Sir, I am half a century old and I have never seen a monopoly die. I want to attend the funeral of the first one. Why, sir, this one died years ago by limitation, but the Legislature of New Jersey called it from its grave, and Dives, not Lazarus, came forth with a new lease of more than original life. The Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, in anticipation of the demise of Camden and Amboy, sought and received a charter from New Jersey, but in eight days after the charter was granted the old monopoly was more alive than ever. And yet my friend tells me it is going to die! Sir, everything else in New Jersey will die first. I give the Senator notice that this corporation will not die. It has too much vitality; and if the honorable Senator flatters himself that it will expire in 1869 he had better at once disabuse his mind. It will outlive his or my senatorial career. It looks as if it might outlive the Pyramids. It has as many hands as the head that was seen in the vision had horns. In all the past it has manipulated the State of New Jersey at will, and in all the future the little State will be managed by the big monopoly.

We are likewise told that the rival railroad corporation in that State is a bankrupt concern. Necessarily so. What but bankruptcy could you expect of a corporation that measured weapons with this privileged monster? Yes, sir, and the nation complains and has the right to complain that this New Jersey monopoly bankrupts everything that attempts to make commerce free. If the evil effects of her special legislation were confined to the citizens of her own State I would not complain, although New Jersey created burdens which fell crushingly upon a majority of her people. But I do and will complain and protest against her attempt to regulate the commerce of her sister States. Let this Senate acknowledge that a State may lawfully do what New Jersey has done in respect of the monopoly, and it follows that "New Jersey" and not "Congress" has the "power to regulate commerce among the several States." Let the word "Congress" be stricken out of the third subdivision of the eighth section in article first of the Constitution, and the words "New Jersey" be inserted in lieu thereof. Upon behalf of Nevada, and for my colleague and myself, however, I protest against the substitution. I invoke from Congress the exercise of the power conferred upon it by the Constitution, and the exercise of which is a stern duty and a plain necessity. It is time, sir, that we intervened upon behalf of the people.

Sir, I do not exaggerate when I say that millions of dollars would have been saved to the people of her sister States if this unnatural New Jersey corporation had never existed. And who is it that asks that the life of the plethoric monster be spared? The monopolists themselves, who boast to their foreign bondholders that they own the best-paying stocking in the world. So they do. Why should not their dividends be greater than that paid by any other corporation? They lay the entire Union under tribute to themselves! Does the State of New Jersey complain of our intervention? If I am answered in the affirmative I convict her out of her own mouth as particeps criminis in the monopolists' wrong. If I am answered in the negative, then I am supplied with an overwhelming reason why Congress should interfere. I do not think the State of New Jersey makes a handsome figure in this affair. She bargains with a privileged class of her own citizens, against herself and her sister States, and for so much pecuniary advantage agrees with the monopolists that they may do all in their power to enrich themselves by obstructing and hindering and delaying free communication and the transit of commerce across her borders. "For a thousand shares of your capital stock New Jersey will agree not to interfere with your plans." The thousand shares are paid, and New Jersey does not interfere. The original consideration has grown, I am informed, to twenty-five hundred shares—if I am wrong, the Senator from New Jersey will correct me—and upon these shares the State of New Jersey receives an annual dividend. Last year the monopoly declared a cash dividend of ten per cent. and a stock dividend of twenty-five per cent.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Nevada, according to the course of his argument, to be in his own estimation entirely qualified by information to make the statements he does upon this floor. I believe, however, the original amount of shares held by New Jersey was a thousand, and that it has been increased to an additional amount.

Mr. NYE. I understand to twenty-five hundred.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I am not prepared to say that it is exactly that amount. But it is not my practice while a Senator is discussing a question in which I have any interest to interrupt him, either by way of correction or suggestion or question.

Mr. NYE. I understand from the best information I can obtain that the number of shares now owned by the State of New Jersey is twenty-five hundred; but for the purposes of this argument I do not care whether the original number has been increased or not.

Mr. President, in the discussion of this question it is not necessary to debate the power of a State to create a monopoly of this character in favor of a privileged class among her own citizens. The ground I take is that if the monopoly relates to matters partly local and partly national, or wholly national, the State cannot confer a privilege exclusive in its character. Article four, section two of the Constitution declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Now, if New Jersey may lawfully tax a citizen of any other State for the privilege or immunity of crossing through her territory, over her borders, more than she taxes her own citizens for the like privilege or immunity, what value is there left in the provision of the Constitution which I have just cited? I suggest, therefore, to Senators that in the consideration of this question it is proper to keep in mind the distinction I take between matters of a purely local character and those which concern the people of all the States alike. These monopolists and the State of New Jersey evidently understand this distinction. Neither makes any secret of the fact that this privilege is designed to benefit Jerseymen at the expense of all other Americans. In an address "to the people of New Jersey," issued in 1846 by the monopolists, I find this language:

"She [meaning New Jersey] has a most enviable geographical position in the Union, which it is her duty to improve for the benefit of her citizens. She has done so in the manner deemed most advisable and profitable, and has reason to be proud of the wisdom which dictated her policy."

Sir, the State of New Jersey, as well as these corporators, knew that internal traffic would not sustain either of the two works which together form this monopoly, and both State and corporation relied upon taxing improperly the citizens of other States as the surest and the only sure means of getting revenue from these internal improvements. I do not claim this as an original suggestion. I find it in a letter addressed, in 1860, by the board of directors of these joint companies to their loan-holders, from which letter I read, as follows:

"Efforts have indeed, within the past thirty years, been sometimes made to induce the Legislature of New Jersey to grant charters for rival railroads, but invariably without success. What could not be done in the infancy of the companies, when the revenue of the State derived from them was small, need excite no apprehension now, when the whole expense of the State government is provided for from the income furnished by the business of our railroads and canals."

Sir, who furnishes this princely income to New Jersey? Do the people of that State? Does the revenue of which these monopolists boast come from the citizens of that State, or is it derived from the tax laid upon every State in the Union by these monopolists under sanction of the laws of New Jersey? The honorable Senator tries to break the damaging force of these facts by asserting that if a citizen of his State residing, for example, in Jersey City, and designing to go to Camden, should cross over to New York and there buy his ticket, he would, notwithstanding his citizenship, have to pay as much for his transportation as a New Yorker would to be carried from New York to Philadelphia. This idea of going due east in order to arrive at a point due west is original with the honorable Senator. None of his constituents, I undertake to say, will soon act upon it. No, sir; the truth of this whole matter is precisely as stated in this letter of 1860. Even in the infancy of the monopoly the State of New Jersey was weaker than it, and so fond of it that it would not yield an inch to the entreaties of her citizens for greater facilities of communication and transit. Now, that the "whole expenses of the State government" are furnished by this huge monopoly, it snaps its fingers in the face of the nation, and says, "The Legislature of our State can neither be coaxed nor frightened into granting a charter to any rival corporation." In this connection let me remind the Senator from New Jersey of his statement that the Camden and Amboy monopoly have but four years to live! Sir, except by the intervention of Congress it will never die. It is but in the infancy of existence.

Mr. President, I have no war to wage against New Jersey or against her corporations. I rejoice in the prosperity of that State and in the prosperity of her people, but I have a war to wage against New Jersey or any State when it attempts to trammel the commerce of the nation. As the case stands, New Jersey is to-day levying a direct tax upon every bushel of grain, upon every ton of merchandise carried across her territory from her sister States, and upon every traveler that crosses her borders. She is doing more and worse. She is taxing the affections and natural instincts of our people, and even laying these under contribution to her; and I will not sit silently by without publicly dissenting. Sir, it is time the evil was stopped and the appropriate remedy adjusted. This will surely be effected by the passage of the bill now under discussion.

What does the bill propose? Are its provisions to have application in New Jersey alone? Do they not apply to all the States indiscriminately and without the invidious mention of any? The object of the bill is to authorize railroads and canals throughout the country to carry freight and passengers, without let or hindrance. Is not this a desirable result? Is it not a necessary measure? Why, sir, it is within the knowledge of us all that since this rebellion broke out, the means of transporting troops and munitions of war to this capital have been notoriously insufficient for the exigence. The Camden and Amboy could not begin to do the work, and when the Secretary of War uses the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad for the purposes of national life and government, up starts this arrogant monopoly and tells the Government that no soldiers or implements of war can be brought across New Jersey to Washington, unless carried by the Camden and Amboy railroad! Was ever such assumption? And yet the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hale] are pleading in favor of such a corporation; a corporation that has sued the Raritan and Delaware Bay road because it obeyed the orders of the General Government, and whose greatest crime, according to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. Hale,] is, that it is bankrupt. Have the poor no claims upon his sympathies? Shall the indigent mother of a soldier-boy who lies bleeding and dying in our hospitals at Washington, having offered up his young life as a sacrifice upon the altar of his country's safety, be obliged to pay the Camden and Amboy railroad three dollars for taking her across New Jersey, on her way to wipe the dew of death from the face of her child, when the Raritan and Delaware Bay road will carry her for two dollars? I might add illustration to illustration, going through the wide field of human sympathy and human suffering, but it cannot be necessary, and would only tend to disturb our better natures. I insist upon it that the time has arrived when it is proper for Congress to correct the evil and apply the remedy. Our commerce must not be restricted by State legislation. It is the vital fluid of national existence, and its circulating avenues must be as unimpeded as the flow of river to the ocean. The natural and the artificial channels of trade must be blended into one harmonious system and be under the control of one directing power. The manner of their use in their relation to commerce cannot safely be left to the determination of the various States.

A sagacious and far-sighted American statesman of the early times fully apprehended the evils which would flow from power in a State to impose burdens upon the commerce of other States passing over her territory to its destination, and it was to avoid the ill consequences he foreshadowed that the sole power to regulate commerce was invested by the Constitution in the national Congress.

Mr. Hamilton, in the Federalist, No. 22, says:

"The interfering and unneighborly regulations of some States, contrary to the true spirit of the Union, have in different instances given just cause of umbrage and complaint to others; and it is to be feared that examples of this nature, if not restrained by a national control, would be multiplied and extended till they became not less serious causes of animosity and discord than injurious impediments to the intercourse between the different parts of the confederacy. The commerce of the German empire is in continual trammels from the multiplicity of duties which the several princes and States exact upon the merchandise passing through their territories, by means of which the fine streams and navigable rivers with which Germany is so happily watered are rendered almost useless. Though the genius of the people of this country might never permit this description to be strictly applicable to us, yet we may reasonably expect, from the gradual conflicts of State regulations, that the citizens of each would at length come to be considered and treated by the others in no better light than that of foreigners and aliens."

Let me say in addition that I know of no way in which this question can be finally disposed of if you refuse to pass the bill under consideration. Pass it, and the constitutional question involved in it will go for decision where it belongs, and, as in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, it will challenge the exercise of the first legal talent. The names and efforts of Webster and Wirt and Oakley and Emmet have made that case illustrious, and I shall expect to see a name not less illustrious than theirs reported in connection with the argument of this question in the Supreme Court. I confidently cherish the expectation of hearing the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] arguing his side of the question before that august tribunal, and bringing to its exposition all his varied research and all the resources of his fruitful erudition. Pass the bill, and the question can be gotten to the courts. Refuse to pass it, and the rivals of this corporation and the people at large are remediless in the premises. Pass it, and the Supreme Court, which has the confidence and respect of the entire Republic, will be able to settle the rights of all concerned.

Mr. President, there is more in this question than would seem upon first blush. There is involved in it what is called State sovereignty, and very much of our future happiness and peace depends upon a proper understanding of the import of these words "State sovereignty." The decision of the Supreme Court in this case will clearly draw the dividing line between the rights of the States and the rights of the nation. For myself, I desire here to say, I reject the whole theory of State sovereignty which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] hopes will be preserved intact amid the confusion and wreck of the present. He seems more solicitous that States should live than that the nation should not die. No, hardly that; but he did say it would be difficult for him to choose between the two. I am under no such embarrassment. I deny to the State any sovereignty, de facto or de jure, as against the nation. Each State in its own orbit circles around the central Government as the planets around the sun, but as the sun is the chief of all these circling globes, so the national Government is the chief of all the States, and, allowing of no rival sovereignty, secures to each its exact measure of rights.

I hope, sir, and believe that the ship of State is safely over the dangerous shoals of separate sovereignty, and that she will never again be exposed to its treacherous quicksands.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] inquired, who asks for the adoption of this bill? Sir, the answer is at hand. The farmers of the West ask it; every waving field of golden grain upon the far-off prairie asks it. The manufacturers of the East ask it; every one of the million spindles of New England, as it twirls to the hum of its own music asks it. The traveling community asks it. Commerce asks it. Several States, including the great State of New York, ask it. Are all these to be denied? Are they to be sacrificed to the happy geographical position of one State, or is the effect which the passage of the bill may have upon one monopoly to be interposed to defeat so national a measure? The bill is as broad as the Republic. It embraces thirty-six stars. It applies as well to the great railroad now being opened up to the western coast as to the Camden and Amboy road. We are anticipating the hour when the whistle of the engine shall be heard upon the mountain tops and through the valleys of that distant portion of our country. The State which I have the honor in part to represent lies at the very base of the occidental slope of the Sierra Nevada. What would be said of an attempt by her to impose a tax on passengers and freight carried upon the Pacific railroad from the Atlantic across her territory? How long would such a tax be submitted to? Would not the Senators from New Hampshire and New Jersey, if they visited that country, as I hope they may, be the first to exclaim against the imposition? If it were wrong in Nevada, is it right in New Jersey?

Mr. President, I beg pardon of the distinguished Senators from New York [Mr. MORGAN and Mr. HARRIS] for having so often spoken of that State in the course of my remarks, but it will require long years to make me forget that that State was my home. I love her people, and I think they love me. I have not meant to trespass upon the prerogatives of her Senators, or to speak for the State they ably represent; but, sir, if the attention of her people was fully directed to the wrong that is being committed against them, the Empire State would find means to protect her sons from the immoderate and anti-American exactions of this overgrown monopoly. Already her Legislature has spoken on this subject, and she waits, as we all wait, patient but confident, that Congress will, without delay, by such legislation as may be necessary, secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." In this hope and belief, sir, I rest the case.

SPEECH OF HON. FERNANDO WOOD, OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 4, 1865.

The naval appropriation bill being under discussion in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the immediate question being on an amendment offered by Hon. HENRY WINTER DAVIS, of Maryland, to create a Board of Admiralty—

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In the remarks I intend to make upon this question, I do not propose to follow in the line of or participate in the discussion of yesterday, so far as that discussion referred to the administration of the Naval Department. It is not my duty to defend the Secretary of the Navy; it is not my purpose or disposition to assail him. Doubtless, sir, much of the criticism of the gentleman from Maryland with reference to the administration of its affairs was well founded. I have no doubt that there are men in the country who could have conducted that Department with more efficiency, with more success, and in a mode that would have been less liable to justify the assaults which have been made upon it in both wings of the Capitol. But I am not disposed to hold the Secretary of the Navy responsible for the results of all the naval engagements since the commencement of this war. I am not disposed to hold responsible the head of any Department for its failure to accomplish all that was expected of him; because, in my judgment, the man does not live who is capable of meeting the responsibility successfully that this stupendous war has imposed upon the Executive Departments of our Government.

Therefore, so far as the administration of those Departments is concerned I am willing for one to be liberal and to exercise a spirit of indulgence with reference to the discharge of their duties. I will not, therefore, participate in that discussion, but have risen for the purpose of saying a word with reference to the amendment, in the way of a proviso, offered by the gentleman from Maryland. It is a proposition to establish a board of naval administration, or a Board of Admiralty. It proposes to create a board consisting of five officers of the Navy, one of whom shall be of the rank of rear admiral, and the remainder commodores and captains, and that this board shall advise with the Secretary of the Navy and share his responsibility. It provides that this board shall deliberate in common and advise with that officer, and that no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any engine ordered, nor indeed any repairs of any consequence performed, except by and with the advice and consent of this Board of Admiralty.

I understood the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] to say yesterday that he is in earnest in offering this amendment, and that he intends to press its adoption by this committee, and he justified it in his usual astute manner by reference not only to the policy of England, but also by allusions to the inefficiency of the head of the Department.

Now, so far as this board is to be constructed on the English plan, I apprehend that there is no analogy between the English system and our own. What constitutes the executive power of England? Not the queen. The executive power of England is vested in the ministry. The executive power of the United States is, under the Constitution, vested in the President of the United States. The President of the United States, by our fundamental law, is made the sole and only executor of our national affairs, and he is responsible to the people and not to Congress. The Secretary of the Navy is simply his subordinate; he is responsible to the President of the United States, the chief executive officer of the country, and not to the Congress of the United States. The President is not only by the Constitution the Chief Executive, but he is more than that, which refers directly and explicitly to this proposed bureau itself; he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. The President of the United States is the head of the Navy Department, clothed by the organic law with the sole and exclusive management of that Department, subject of course to such laws as the Congress of the United States may make in pursuance and not in contravention of the Constitution. The Secretary of the Navy is, therefore, his subordinate.

Now, sir, what does this amendment propose? We propose to create, not a subordinate but a co-ordinate department of the Navy. We propose to make a Board of Admiralty clothed with equal powers with the Secretary of the Navy, and, in some regards, with superior power to that which the Secretary of the Navy holds by law. Can we do that? Have we the power to designate the officers and men, as it is proposed to do by this amendment, who shall constitute a coördi-nate executive department over and above and against the powers and wishes of the President? I think not, sir; but had we the power, would it make the Department more efficient to do that which will of necessity create dissident councils? Can we remedy the defects that exist in the Navy Department, and I do not deny their existence, by creating in its midst an antagonistic element, thus inviting division, which is the mother of all inefficiency in council as well as in execution?

Sir, responsibility accompanies power, and power must accompany responsibility, and I prefer a concentration of responsibility and a concentration of power. I believe that that is the purest element of republican government which strengthens the Executive, and that is the best and most simple form of executive power which disembarasses the agent of the people in the discharge of the official duties confided to him.

Sir, what is our system? We have the legislative department separate and independent; we have the judiciary department separate and independent; we have the executive department separate and independent; and whereas in this country laws are simply the embodiment of the opinions and wishes of the people, made by the agents of the people in legislative capacity assembled, where you give the Executive unrestricted power to execute those laws you preserve the design which the people had in the creation of those laws through the instrumentality of their agents.

I hold, therefore, that in conformation to the restriction of the fundamental law holding the Executive to the strictest accountability to the power that created him, he should be disembarassed, unrestricted, and untrammelled. But, sir, this amendment is based upon the theory that naval officers are the most competent to discharge these special duties. It provides for the appointment of five of the oldest, and, if you please, the ablest, officers of the Navy, to constitute this Board of Admiralty, and the presumption is that they are to be selected from the very best-qualified and most competent officers in the service.

Now, sir, such men's services are required on the ocean. It would be an injury to the service to take men of this ability and capacity from the proper sphere of their duties, and bring them to this capital to do that which landmen should do, and that which, in my judgment, only landmen are qualified to do.

Again, sir, in the commercial marine it is the experience of the merchants of the city of New York that the men who are best qualified to sail ships are not the best qualified to build them; that one profession is separate and distinct from the other; and it does not necessarily follow that a man who has had long experience in sailing a vessel and managing its affairs is qualified to construct a vessel, to shape a model for a vessel; that he knows more about the mechanical organization of the vessel he commands than the humble mechanic who has performed the work of constructing that vessel.

Steers, the celebrated constructor of the yacht America, who founded a new school of naval architecture, never was at sea before he conceived the model. He improved upon the existing class of models of his day, and constructed a yacht which, after beating everything in America, was taken to Europe, and beat everything there. Sir, he was a boy from the ship-yards of New York; and not only have the best and most fleet merchantmen been since modeled upon his idea in the construction of yachts, but the best Government vessels are modeled upon the same idea.

Hence it is that I contend that, were it right to form this board; were it right to plant in any Department of this Government an antagonistic element leading to dissension and division there; that were there no other objection to the passage of this amendment, these men proposed to constitute this board are, in my judgment, not necessarily qualified, because they are naval officers, to perform the duties which would be imposed upon them. Upon this ground, if upon no other, I should oppose the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word as to the naval appropriation bill itself. This bill proposes appropriations in the aggregate of some $105,000,000, as against $85,000,000 last year, and as against $13,300,000 the year immediately preceding the commencement of this war. The whole amount collected from the internal revenue taxation for the year ending the 30th of June last was about $109,000,000. Assuming that the present collections are not much in excess of what they then were, it is proposed to take the whole amount of these collections, the results of this enormous burden upon the people of the country, and expend it upon one Department of the Government. Well, sir, I shall be answered that the cause of this expenditure or proposed expenditure arises from the war. Now, sir, is this war to go on to justify this expenditure of the public money, and the imposition of these burdens upon the labor and industry of the country? I regret, sir, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is not in his seat, that I might be enabled to ask him some questions with reference to the details of this bill, and with regard to the necessity for the imposition of this heavy tax required to meet the appropriations proposed in this bill. I can only say, Mr. Chairman, that I had hoped, and I yet hope, that this war will cease, that the negotiations of which we have recently heard so much will be productive of fruit, and that the antagonistic sections and States shall once more be brought together in communion and fraternal concord. If it be true, sir, that the President of the United States and the Secretary of State have gone personally to meet ambassadors or representatives or commissioners, as you may please to call them, from Richmond, I think that, instead of this proceeding being obnoxious to the censure which I have heard bestowed upon it, they but follow the precedent of Washington and Hamilton, who, in a similar emergency, went (the one President and the other Secretary of the Treasury) to treat with rebels who were engaged in the whisky insurrection, in Pennsylvania, in 1796. If, therefore, it be true that the President of the United States has made an honest effort to stop this shedding of blood, this exhaustion of the energies of our great country; if it be true that, realizing his responsibility to his country and his God, he has thus risen superior to partisanship and the unfortunate influences which have surrounded him, I say, all thanks to him, and God speed him in the work of mercy and justice and right!

I know that rumor says that these negotiations, if negotiations there were, have failed. I think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] indicated in his remarks this morning that there had been such failure. Sir, if this is the fact, it is to be regretted; but if they have failed in consequence of an indisposition upon the part of the rebel authorities to return to the Union; if they have failed because those States and those so-called authorities refuse to reunite upon the basis of a common Union under a common Constitution, demanding recognition and separation, then I say that, so far as I represent the peace sentiment of the North, we will not and cannot sustain them in that position.

Sir, I have been opposed to this war because I am opposed to its effects and fear its results. I was opposed to it and to its continuance till every conciliatory mode had been exhausted and proved a failure. It has been one of the sources of my complaint against this Administration; it has been one of the gravest charges which, in my judgment, can be properly made against it, that instead of having proposed negotiations it has prevented any propositions of peace being made to it by denying admittance to this capital of any agent or emissary of the rebel government. Therefore, until I am satisfied that this Administration earnestly desires peace, that it has exhausted everything which in honor it could do to procure peace consistent with the Union and the maintenance of the laws and the Constitution of our country—until that time comes, sir, I must retain my position in favor of peace and in favor of negotiation as against continued hostility.

But, if these peaceful efforts have been made and exhausted, if the door to conciliation and union has been thrown open by the President of the United States, and if the answer to that has been recognition or separation, why, sir, so far as my feeble influence is concerned, it will be given in aid of our country to maintain in every constitutional way the national integrity. Since the expiration of the first year of this war I have thought that the southern States repented of the hasty and violent course they had adopted in the attempt at secession. I knew that the leading men of that section had not anticipated any very serious opposition to their withdrawal from the Union—certainly could not have supposed that the North would or could make the combined and Herculean efforts in opposition, which it soon became apparent it would and could do.

Equally resolute and determined on their side, having thrown down their gauntlet of defiance, they have continued the struggle with a valor and self-sacrifice which find no parallel in history. And in passing, permit me to say that whatever may become of this war, however it may end, the history of these times, yet to be written, will devote its brightest and most eloquent pages to a recital of the heroic deeds and the self-sacrificing endurance of the people who now contend against the continuance of the American Union. But, sir, however high and ennobling their convictions of duty, and however great their enthusiasm, I have not and cannot sympathize with the object, if it be eternal dissolution. Well, sir, the struggle has gone on. Instead of closing, as some supposed it would, in a few weeks, months and years have passed and it yet continues. The din of arms, the groans of the wounded and dying, the murmurs of the oppressed tax-payers, the threats of foreign intervention, the diversion of labor from its wonted channel, the imminent danger of ruin to our ancient institutions, and all the evils incident to internal war among a people whose Government was made exclusively for internal peace, has indeed caused the truly patriotic in both sections to pause and weep. I know what I say to be true. The disinterested lovers of their country at both extremes have deeply lamented this fratricidal conflict. Among such men a settlement by negotiation has appeared to be the only hope. It was thought that the opposing extremists could be thus brought together; that however violent, if the leading men in arms had an opportunity to commune freely with their old political and personal associates, and all the States an opportunity to resume their position within the Union with their rights secured, that they would do so.

Believing this, and to this end, I have opposed hostilities and advocated negotiations. Under this conviction I have strove for a conference. I have in season and out of season urged an armistice, at least long enough to bring the authorized agents of the contending parties in consultation. I did not doubt a favorable result. I felt sure of the end, supposing that the people of the South would see that their noblest glory and their highest interest lie in obliterating the dreadful hostilities which had been engendered and in uniting with us, in a common effort to maintain the integrity of the American soil, the honor of the American flag, and the nationality of the American Union against foreign aggression, and in opposition to the existence of imperialism on the American continent. This, sir, has been my hope by day and my dream by night. I wanted my countrymen once more united—united in concord to sustain union among themselves, and united as against despotism elsewhere. I thought if this could be accomplished the dreadful ordeal through which we have passed would be accepted as but the painful process by which the Almighty prepared us for the great mission of universal freedom and liberalism. Four years of war have not only developed our martial prowess and tested our martial strength, but have produced and made efficient a million fighting men, now in arms, the like of which the world has never seen. Thus the conquering armies of the North and South, under the lead of a Sherman, or a Grant, or a Lee, would present a military combination which could strike terror to the invaders of republican soil, whether in Northern or Southern America. As monarchies have attempted to dictate the form of government here, so could we thus together, following their example, direct that absolutism should cease everywhere. If republicanism can be subverted in Mexico, so can kingcraft in Ireland, in Italy, and in Hungary. Then indeed would come the struggle between universal freedom and universal bondage; whether Christendom "shall be all slave or all free." Upon that issue the American arms would enter; upon that glorious enterprise the united American States would combine under the guidance of our holy Master, who recognized but one Lord and but one King.

Well, Mr. Speaker, at last circumstances produced or brought about a condition of things which appeared to warrant the President in entering upon a conference. I am not advised, nor is it important what these circumstances were. It is sufficient to say that a meeting was held, and that this meeting was composed of the very highest executive authority on our side, and almost equally high in authority on the other. Certainly so far as the personnel of this conference was concerned it was composed of the best material. Dispensing with intermediaries it may be said with truth that the high controlling parties were happily brought in direct personal relations. A consultation thus held could not but be productive of results, if results were possible. Each side was qualified to speak understandingly and by authority, and did so, doubtless. The result is said to be before us. My position is predicated on this assumption. It is soon told; the mournful fact is divulged in the few short words which tell of total failure—recognition demanded! and declined! I care not, Mr. Speaker, to know details. Nations do not approach the consideration of details until after the settlement of the general or more vital questions at issue. In this case I assume that the simple question on our side was, Will you resume your position within the Federal Union? The answer could be but yes or no. No power could deny the equal right of the southern States and people to all their rights within the Union if they declared the willingness to come in. When their opposition ceases ours as a necessity ceases also. If it be said that their assent to come in is dependent on certain conditions as to indemnity, &c., &c., the obvious answer is that all the questions which will necessarily arise of this kind, not only with reference to the southern but as well to the northern people and States, must be deferred until peace shall be restored and the Government is relieved from the immediate burden of the war. If in the Union the southern States will themselves be parties to the arrangement of the details, and have the right to participate in any legislation or other action taken; and no power will exist to prevent it.

But, sir, it is declared, and doubtless true, that the demand was for a recognition of their existence as a separate nation or confederacy of States, and the propositions submitted on their side did not in any event comprehend reunion. Now, sir, if this is the true state of the case, and I apprehend it will so be ascertained, the result which I have so ardently contended and hoped for and expected has not been obtained. I have been deceived in the disposition of the enemy. While a large portion of that people yearn for peace and a restoration of amicable relations with the North, as evinced even by the army as the commissioners passed through their ranks to the front, the men in authority at Richmond persist in impossible conditions of settlement. They have not responded in the true spirit of patriotism, and have not yet seen the folly of their undertaking. When I contended for peace and opposed the war, it was not to accomplish the downfall of the American Union. It was not to meet the demands of southern extremists who ask for separation. It was not because I favored the success of the southern arms in overthrowing the unity of the Federal power. I asked for negotiations as in my judgment the better way to accomplish the objects in view of restoration. I was opposed to the continuance of hostilities until conciliation had been tried and had failed. I did not see how destructive warfare could conciliate those in arms against us. I do not see it yet; but I do see that the northern people and Government will not and cannot yield up the Union and the soil which properly belong to it.

The South persists in a demand for separation. The properly constituted Government of the whole Union, about whose authority there is no dispute, refuse to and cannot submit to this pretension. Whether right or wrong this is a pregnant fact; and we who pray for peace, who deeply lament the sore afflictions which the South endures, have no recourse except to take one side or the other. Those who believe that the South is in the right and should become an independent antagonistic power, have no business here. If the alternative is presented of national dismemberment, and that dreadful result is right within itself, no one should remain a citizen of one of the divisions while honestly sympathizing with and wishing success to the other.

Negotiations for an amicable adjustment having failed, and no recourse left but war, the people of both sections are bound to sustain one side or the other. We cannot live in a community whose interests and united action we repel. In this case it is too late to contend for abstractions and obsolete theories; "old things have passed away;" civil war with its stern and unyielding realities thrusts rudely aside the dreamy tenets of the past. Political philosophy, however right within itself, belongs to another order of national affairs and to another condition of the body-politic. This is a period of action, not sentiment; of physical trials, not of ideas. It is folly to persist in the application of impracticable doctrines instead of accepting those which inevitable fate has forced upon us. For myself, after a fruitless effort to obtain what ought to be, I have resigned myself to what is; I shall stand by my country, my whole country, "right or wrong, my country." While I deplore the continuance of this dreadful conflict it is too late to moralize. The Union we cannot give up. This the South should know once and forever. Disunion is impossible. We cannot recognize the existence of another confederacy made from the States which created and are a part of this Government. This is our reply and this is the determination. The responsibility of what follows will rest with those who first provoked hostilities and then refused reconciliation. If they persist in presenting an ultimatum war or separation, I fear yet further sacrifices will be required of them. If, after near four years of aggression, in which their homes and firesides have been desecrated, their fruitful fields made desolate and waste, their material resources nearly exhausted, and their cause almost reduced to the hazard of a battle, they still persist in refusing an honorable adjustment, I cannot regard their position as right, however much I may admire the spirit with which it is sustained.

"God save the Republic!" and let us once more renew our efforts to procure peace; but if failing, let us preserve our nationality that we may preserve our liberties and transmit to posterity the blessings which were transmitted to us.

RECONSTRUCTION.

SPEECH OF HON. C. M. HARRIS, OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 21, 1865,

On the bill to guaranty to the States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The bill before the House is entitled one to guaranty to the States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government, and therefore applies to the governments of such States, whether usurped or overthrown. If usurped, it is the duty of the United States, under the provision of the Constitution claimed as a sanction for this bill, to restore to such States the administration of the governments so usurped if it can. Yet I expect to show, when speaking with reference to the provisions of the bill, that if they were enforced the United States would become the usurper of the governments, though republican, of each of such States, under the specious pretense of guarantying to such States such forms of government. If overthrown, the title assumes that to exist which cannot—a State of the United States without a government. If the definition of the word overthrown, especially when applied to governments, given by the best lexicographers is correct, which is "destroyed," there never was such a thing as a State of this Union without a government. It was only by the formation of a government by the people of each of the original States for themselves, acting through majorities, and the framing and adopting of the Constitution by nine, and subsequent ratification by the other four, that they became such of this Union; and all the others became so by such formation of governments and admission by Congress. So, to the existence of any such State a government is as essential as territory; and if so, it can no more exist after the destruction of one than the other. Clay in human shape, through breath, only receives the impress of our Creator, and becomes human so to remain so long as animated therewith, after which it becomes a corpse. So such a State, by the overthrow of its government, becomes a relapse, undesignated and unbounded territory, a political corpse.

Such is not the condition of any State of this Union, nor is it one ever desired by the people of those in rebellion, but is wholly irreconcilable with their devotion to and tenacity for their reserved rights, which are preserved and protected by State governments only, from their greatest antagonism, intervention, the bane of free government. I need not say unwarranted intervention, for such is the import of the word in a political sense, and especially when applied to the relations of the States with the United States; the fearful apprehension of which, by this Administration, not only precipitated the people of those States into rebellion, but horrified conservative men of all sections with desponding alarm for the safety of the Union. The inhabitants of those States did not rebel against the governments of their respective States, but on account of such apprehensions, against that of the United States, to which, otherwise, they, as a people, would, through danger and sacrifices, however imminent and impoverishing have adhered with a purpose so determined, enthusiastic, patriotic, and enduring, as would have been commendable even to the memories of our common and most noble ancestry, as being, of all that could be devised by man, the most conducive to the protection of those of each of the States in the full exercise of their reserved rights, and enjoyment of free government, if administered in the spirit that induced and conceived its formation. They became rebels, not from hostility to it, but fearful apprehensions that this Administration would, in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of their respective States, want only invade their absolute and most important and cherished political rights. Unfortunately for our blood and treasure, the restoration of the Union, the founding of free governments throughout the world, and the opportunity presented by their rebellion of most successfully vindicating the strength, efficiency, and durability of our republican form of government, to the terror, chagrin, and discomfiture of the despots of the world, by demonstrating, through the restoration of the Union, its perfect compatibility, enduring strength, and centripetal self-preserving and defending virtue; though possessed of no power or sovereignty whatever, save that specifically delegated to it by the States in the Constitution of its formation, and thus exploding their cherished theory, that such Governments must become centralized or disrupted by inherent weakness or incompatibility. But fortunately for the strength, progress, and prolongation of the rebellion, and for the supremacy of anarchy, savage despotism, corruption, and crime, in all the States, such apprehensions have been more than realized, through the most cruel and degrading usurpations of despotic power, in violation of every important provision of the Constitution, and therefore necessarily of the reserved rights of the people of every State of the Union; although supposed by some, and asserted by most of the leaders of the Administration, to have been unfounded.

Can the alleged overthrow of such governments, or of any of them, be possibly attributed to any cause whatever, save the action of the administration of either our Government, that of those States or some of them, or that of the so-called confederacy? It cannot, for the most conclusive reason: that none other has had since the rebellion any political connection or controversy whatever with them or any of them. If so, and I think it incontrovertible, these governments exist, unless they have been so overthrown. Have they? And if so, by the action of the administration of which? Not by that of this Government, it being but the political creature and trustee of the States, and so made by the voluntary act of nine of them, each then having the government it now has and possessing and reserving like sovereignty therefor, of which Virginia, Georgia, North and South Carolina, included in the provisions of this bill, were four. So if the United States possesses the rightful power to overthrow the government of any of the nine States that created it, each of such States voluntarily coöperated in conferring upon a political fabric of their own creation—ordained expressly for the preservation and perpetuation of each of such governments, under such local administrations as the people and their posterity of each might institute—the power to destroy them.

Though the legitimate administrations of such governments are suspended, they are not overthrown, and may be administered by a sufficient number of any of their respective inhabitants who are voters and eligible to office, without national legislation or adjudication or executive action peculiar to their condition, or other than ordinary. Or although every statute law of such States should be repealed, and their archives, statutes, and everything in them should be consumed; or every citizen in them become traitors and rebels in arms against the authority of such States and that of the United States; or every inhabitant of them so abscond as to leave them without one, and never return—such governments would remain with their normal and inherent vigor, and by such number of any who might become under the organic and statute laws of such States voters and eligible to office in them respectively, could be, without such legislation, adjudication, or executive action, as constitutionally and successfully administered as if their legitimate administrations had never been suspended, and yet never can be constitutionally, successfully, nor in accordance with the principles upon which ours and free Governments are based, only by the consent of the people of such States, respectively, through such number so qualified. As upon such restoration of the administration of the governments of such States depends the perpetuity of the Union, the object of our every political effort should be to effect it, and thereby restore the Union through the only power that it can be, and that by which it was formed, the will of the people of the States, as such, acting through majorities and State organizations, when, if ever, the advocates of this bill and such or any, shall have succeeded in destroying the governments of such States they will not have in depriving the people of any thereof of the right to, for themselves, respectively, organize others; nor can they, as to would thwart the decrees of God by which it was ordained. Such attributes being in peace or war, and under any circumstances, as paramount to the political power of the United States as to that of any crown, and as inviolable as good faith should ever be, the people of such States, in their eagerness and determination to die in defense of, rather than surrender it, would interpose against an attempt to usurp it rivers of blood and mountains of slain.

The exclusive exercise by the people of each of the States of such and like prerogatives constitutes the political state of man ordained by his Creator, and the only one in which he can attain that high destiny for which he was created, and for which our fathers would have severed their allegiance to Great Britain, though a monarchical government, regarding no government not securing to the people of each of the colonies such attributes as preferable to or any than a monarchy, as ever evinced in their several political action and connection in the formation, administration, and dissolution of two unions previous to this, and by our fathers of New England, of one composed of the colonies of that section, in all of which such attributes were reserved by each colony for the people thereof, each of which were by their respective articles of confederation to have been perpetual, or would have fought a battle of the Revolution, through the success of which such principles became so triumphant that Great Britain acknowledged each of the original States to be free and independent. Each of the nine of which that formed this Government reserved for the people of each, and those of such as might become States of it, and their posterity, such attributes, the principles of which were by Jefferson and Madison embodied in a party creed, and so ably defended by them, Jackson, and Douglas, and to-day, as ever, maintained by the Democratic party, and upon which only can this Government be successfully administered, which I shall show that the now Administration party held but for the purpose of obtaining the power that it is now wielding for its destruction, in which its masses are necessarily, by force of its organization, though unconsciously, participating. Our Government, by reason of the unprecedented freedom, integrity, devotion, happiness, and prosperity of her citizens, consequent upon its having been administered so long, as the Administration party promised that they would, that is, "on the principles of our fathers," had become the most powerful and renowned of earth's empires, and so loved and venerated by her own, and feared and envied by most, and admired by all others, as to have been invincible by foreign foes. Having become too dear to her own to have fallen in a conflict with all others that could have been combined against her, but never so mighty that it may not from its maladministration, the fabric of which, though as equitable, strong, and durable as human wisdom and integrity could have devised, is equally delicate and wholly dependent upon its being administered in good faith and strict conformity to the law of its organization, which will secure for it an allegiance of our people so tenacious, and a respect of all others so profound as to perpetuate it with man's probationary time without any compromise whatever, as its founders in its formation so conceded to, and provided for sections and conflicting interests and its institutions, as to have rendered any unnecessary to such perpetuation, unless in consequence of usurpations or violations of constitutional rights.

The formation of governments involves the most vital questions of a temporal nature. They are based on the volition of the people or that of tyrants. The former is sustained by the appreciation of the people. The latter, in disregard for and contempt thereof, and by withholding from them the right of self-government with the purse and sword, through which monopolies and exclusive privileges are established and maintained.

Of what avail to the people are the reserved rights of the States if that of retaining or altering their governments are not of them, and held inviolable? As only through such governments can they exercise any of such rights, of which the original States have no more or different than the new, which by the provisions of the Constitution were admitted on an equality with them. The leaders of the people of the States in rebellion having become rebels, and established the so-called confederacy for the purpose of obtaining, as they supposed they might, better security for their State governments, certainly would not, if they could, have destroyed governments for which they have exercised a criminal attachment. Nor would the masses of them, then, so generally, as ever before attached to the Union, have, if they could. The so-called confederate government, not being one de jure, never had the political power to abolish those State governments which are; and were it such an one, it could not, for the right to preserve, administer and alter such governments, are of the rights reserved by each of such States of the so-called confederacy. No one would, I think, be so presumptuous as to assert that those governments, or any of them, have been overthrown, unless by the action—I use the word action, as it and overthrown are correlative terms—of some of the powers or so-called powers of which I have spoken in that connection, nor foolish or devoid of self-respect as to insist that they, or any of them, have thus been. Nor do any who are attached to free institutions, and are uncontaminated with the anti-republican heresies which alone constitute the creed of most of the leaders of this Administration, desire that they should be, much less would any such assume that they were, believing as do all patriots, that upon their existence and exercise in and with all the dignity, individuality, equality, independence, majesty, and supremacy, emanating from their inherent and reserved rights, as inviolable by Federal intervention as foreign invasion, depends the personal liberty and rights of the people of every State, the permanency of our Government, and the progress of free institutions on earth. Yet the advocates of this bill, who fully understand it, do so desire, because of their purpose thereby manifested, of inflicting on humanity that devastation and despair which I have stated would result from such overthrow, as I think I have shown and expect further to when I refer to the provisions of the bill, or so many thereof as time will admit, every section of which so fully bears the impress of such purpose as to induce the resistless, and yet mortifying, humiliating, and fearful conviction that should it receive the formal sanction required to make laws, though unconstitutional, it will then be for the want of that cognizance of the subject-matter of its provisions by any of the departments of this Government necessary to give it the force of law. It would nevertheless by the sword and treasure of the people, degraded and defied by its passage, be unscrupulously and cruelly enforced against their common will, sentiment, and vested rights, as a means of producing such consequences, and thereby rendering restoration impossible, and revolution, in accordance with their despotic desires, successful, permanent, and supreme.

Admitting—which I do only to show the absurdity of the title of the bill—that those States exist with their governments overthrown, yet governments which have been overthrown have no existence; so this bill proposes to guaranty that which it asserts has no existence, though the word imports, and any act, agreement, or contract that constitutes a guarantee implies the existence of something to which the guarantee relates as secondary thereto, and intended to secure to the guarantee. The provisions of the Constitution claimed in the title to the bill as a sanction for its provisions, require the United States to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and therefore can operate under such provision only upon governments and in the relation of a guarantor of republican forms of government for the States, and not in that of a founder of governments of any kind, however republican in form, nor in that of intermeddling with any such governments by legislating upon matters legislation on which is reserved to the States respectively or to the people, or changing or suspending the operation of such governments or the laws thereof, or limiting their powers, and consequently is wholly inapplicable to States whose governments have been overthrown, (admitting that there are such,) and was inserted and intended to secure to them the enjoyment of such governments, republican in form, as they may have made for themselves. Why this absurdity in the title of a bill, framed by men of such legislative and legal experience and acquirements and distinguished ability? Because, as I think, of their inordinate desire, under the guise of some constitutional provision, to pass a bill subversive of the reserved rights of the people of such States, that this Administration may, (in the name of the Constitution and under pretense of devotion to the Union,) usurp powers, of which that instrument recognizes each of the States sovereign, and of which they would be without such recognition, which is merely declaratory, and was dictated by unnecessary caution, arising from unabating attachment to such rights and restless fears of their interdiction, and of their inability to select any other provision of that instrument which they could, as they suppose, more successfully prostitute to their monstrous designs against these States, and the Union of all the States, and, as an inevitable consequence, against the people of all the States.

That gentlemen, who never could have become members of this body without having taken the oath prescribed to and required of them by that instrument to support it, and can exercise no power not therein authorized, should attempt by a willful perversion of that instrument to usurp powers coveted by tyrants only would be incredible to one ignorant of the provisions of this bill and the history of this Administration, and especially as they, as members of this House, are chosen more directly and frequently by the people than any other incumbents of any of the departments of the Government; and are supposed to, and should, more than any others, reflect their political sentiments and appreciate their wants. This House is, under the theory of our Government, one of the important divisions of a department, without which it would not be republican; is more democratic and closely allied to the people of the States than any other division of the departments of the Government or department thereof, and was organized as the most powerful and reliable barrier of the people of the States, as such, against any attempted usurpations of the United States; I need not add centralization of power, as all such usurpations inevitably tend to it. The political relations between the members of this body and the United States and States being so sacred, important, delicate, and confidential, and being so fixed by the Constitution, does not the claim of constitutionality for this bill render its authors guilty of the moral and political crime of not only ingratitude to the memories of the framers of the Constitution but of slander thereof, and infidelity and treachery to the people? To the extent that powers were delegated to the United States by the States, through the Constitution of the United States, and were by it prohibited to the States. The United States are sovereign, and will so remain as to those so delegated and prohibited, as far as not modified or withdrawn, in conformity with that instrument, until they shall become extinct, if ever, by reason of the destruction of that instrument when they will revert to the people of each State, who retain the reversion thereof, as are and will be those, which each of those States possessed when independent sovereignties, and not thus delegated by, nor prohibited to, them in such instrument so long as their governments exist. And yet there was no division of power, for the reason that the whole so delegated to the United States and prohibited to the States, was an emanation of the separate and voluntary act of nine of the thirteen States that composed the Confederation, in a Convention called for the amendment of the Articles thereof, which act was a violation of such Articles, which declared that the Union under it should be perpetual. Yet by such act alone the Union was created, and the nine States thereof became foreign to the other four; two of which, Rhode Island and North Carolina, were so treated by acts of Congress, under the Administration of the immortal Washington; and was, therefore, not a partition of powers, but delegation thereof wholly, though ordinarily designated as delegated and prohibited powers, as a partition of powers can be made only between two or more governments or parties jointly possessing them, which relationship is requisite to the division of political or other powers, and did not exist between the United States and the nine States, nor any of them; for that the United States, and the Government thereof, having been created only by the delegation and prohibition of powers by the States, could not have existed until the consummation of such act of delegation and prohibition; which was the adoption of the Constitution, which is a compact between all the States of the Union only, entered into originally by such nine of them acting through their respective majorities and State organizations, for the establishment for themselves and posterity of this their General Government for specifically named and clearly limited common purposes.

Though this Administration obtained power, and most if not all of the supporters of this bill their places in this House, by such professions of devotion to the rights of each State of the Union as were incorporated in its party platform of 1860, which are "that the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power upon which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend," thus asserting not only as fully and positively as language can the rights of the States, and especially of each State, so to govern exclusively itself, but holding that upon the maintenance inviolate of the exclusive exercise of such rights by the people of each State depends the existence of our Government. Yet that party, which includes the friends of this bill, notwithstanding such professions then and before, and ever since, have been, so far as its leaders supposed they could stealthily and successfully, under pretence of devotion to God, humanity, human rights, and freedom, the Constitution, the Union, the Union of our fathers as made and administered by them, and its preservation as so made and administered, the Union of the Constitution, the old flag, and the principles upon which the Government was administered by our fathers, naming and eulogizing as such Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, slaveholders, to exclude the elder Adams, who was not one, but the second President, and therefore one of our fathers, so called, to escape the odium of the name and tenets of the Federal party, their political paternity, organized by him, Hamilton, and others, who preferred a centralized Government to ours, and of which tenets abolitionism is the worst, most deceitful, cruel, intolerant, despotic, and revolutionary manifestation; and that they might have changed the name of their party so often that the most sagacious of them cannot determine whether it is Republican, Union, or no-party; and that it can be identified only by that of the Administration party, and to those on which Jackson, who was a slaveholder, administered it, and to him personally—seldom, if ever, mentioning the name of John Q. Adams, a son of the elder Adams, and an immediate predecessor of Jackson, only to such as admired the name or are aware of the falsity and designs of such professions, all whom, save the former, they and their political ancestors have denounced for being pro-slavery, and therefore tyrannical and infamous, and whose memories they detest. And to Douglas, whom they had stigmatized as a scoundrel, demagogue, and traitor, and had charged was more pro-slavery than any slaveholder, and therefore more infamous, instilling into the minds of the people contempt for the Constitution of the United States, and disregard thereof and resistance thereto, because of its most salutary and self-preserving provisions, sanctioning the reservation of such rights and protecting the States and the people in the exercise of them, and inculcating into them the dogma that slavery is incompatible with a republican form of Government, and is creative of such antagonisms as render ours abominable and impotent; and revolution, duty to God and humanity, and essential to success of free institutions, in order to enlist them as their supporters in the accomplishment of their design of revolutionizing our Government and usurping the constitutional rights of the States and the people with the power that they obtained by false professions of patriotic devotion to the inviolability of such rights, that instrument, and to the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the people, and perpetuity and renown of the Union, to consummate which many of its leaders are pressing upon this House the passage of this and kindred bills.

As hypocritical sinners, claiming to be Christians, profess remarkable enthusiastic concern for the cause of our Redeemer, so do demagogues and tyrants, and for that of our Union, and the memory of those who have immortalized themselves by a patriotic devotion to it and tenacious regard for the principles which they advocated. Because of the high appreciation of the people for the purity of such causes, the correctness of such principles, and honor of the memories of such, and of their conviction that through such professions and appreciations they can accomplish their sinister and monstrous purposes, as is clearly demonstrated by such leaders in their professed and infamously hypocritical devotions of which I have spoken. If not, why have they shamefully disregarded each of them, the violation of any one of which would have subjected them to the infamy of such a charge, and why do they persist in asserting that they desire that the Government should be administered as it was by Washington, Madison, Jefferson, and Jackson, and that Douglas, if living, would be prominent among them, knowing that Washington, as President, approved a bill accepting the cession by North Carolina of territory in which it was provided that no regulations made or to be made by Congress should tend to emancipate slaves; as he did bills for the admission into the Union of two slave States, Kentucky and Tennessee; and that in his Farewell Address advised us to indignantly frown upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which bind together its various parts. That Jefferson said that John Adams was supported for the Presidency by the monarchical Federalists, and that he (Jefferson) was the author of the Kentucky resolutions of 1799, and as President sanctioned a treaty through which we acquired an area of territory many times larger than that of the original States, and in which by it the abolishment of the institution of slavery was prohibited, unless by the consent of the people thereof; and that he, in writing concerning the Missouri Compromise, which excluded slavery from only a part of slave territory, and was therefore urged as an equitable partition of common territory between free and slave States, said that it was treason against human hope, and would create a geographical line that would be recurring on every occasion and renewing irritations until it would kindle such a mortal hatred as to render separation preferable to eternal discord; that he had been among the most sanguine in believing that our Union would be of long duration, but that he then doubted it much, and that he saw the event at no great distance, and that his only comfort and consolation was that he would not live to see it; that the question was hushed for the moment, but it was a reprieve only, not a final sentence; and that the leaders of Federalism, on its eclipse, not extinction, after being defeated in their party schemes to obtain power by rallying partisans to the principles of monarchism, advocated such compromise as a party trick to secure such power. That Madison was the author of the Virginia resolutions of 1798, and the report relative thereto of the House of Delegates of Virginia, of 1800; and that he, as President, signed a bill for the admission of Louisiana as a slave State. That Jackson, as President, signed a bill for the admission of Arkansas, and had warned the people that the abolition party was an offspring of the Federal party, and a disunion, hypocritical, and treacherous one, and in his farewell address to his countrymen said:

"Every State must be the sole judge of the measures proper to secure the safety of its citizens and promote their happiness; and all efforts on the part of the people of other States to cast odium upon their institutions, and all measures calculated to disturb their rights of property or to put in jeopardy their peace and internal tranquillity are in direct opposition to the spirit in which the Union was formed, and must endanger its safety. Motives of philanthropy may be assigned for this unwarrantable interference, and weak men may persuade themselves for a moment that they are laboring in the cause of humanity and asserting the rights of the human race, but every one, upon sober reflection, will see that nothing but mischief can come from these improper assaults upon the feelings and rights of others. Rest assured that the men found busy in this work of discord are not worthy of your confidence, and deserve your strongest reprobation."

That Douglas had denounced their party as being Federal, having reference to the Federal party, and corrupt, deceitful, revolutionary, and destructive, and as late as the 25th December, A. D. 1860, wrote to a friend that it could no longer be disguised that many of the Republican Senators desired war and disunion under pretext of saving the Union, and that for partisan purposes they were anxious to dissolve the Union, if it could be done without holding them responsible before the people; and in the last speech which he ever made in the Senate of the United States, in 1861, said:

"I am a Union man, and hence against war; but if the Government must be broken, and a de facto government set up by some of the States, let no act be done that will prevent a restoration. Peace is the only policy that can lead to that result.

"Have we a Government? is the question; and we are told that we must test that question by using the military power to put down all discontented spirits. Sir, this question, 'Have we a Government?' has been propounded by every tyrant who has tried to keep his feet on the necks of the people since the world began. When the barons demanded Magna Charta from King John, at Runnymede, he exclaimed, 'Have we a Government?' and called for his army to put down the discontented barons. When George III called upon his army to put down the rebellion in America, Lord North cried lustily, 'No compromise with traitors! Let us demonstrate that we have a Government!'"

"Sir, when ten million people proclaim to you that they apprehend their firesides and their families are in danger, it becomes a wise Government to listen to the appeal and remove the apprehension. History does not record one example where any human government has been strong enough to crush ten million people into subjection when they believed their right, and liberties were imperiled, without first converting the government itself into a despotism and destroying the last vestige of freedom.

"What man in all America, with a heart in his bosom, who knows the facts connected with Fort Sumter, can hesitate in saying that duty, honor, patriotism, and humanity require that Anderson and his little band should be instantly withdrawn? Sir, I am not afraid to say so. Peace is the only policy that will save the country."

And that in the spring or summer of that year, and some time after the commencement of the war, in a speech made at Springfield, Illinois, and, I think, next to the last he ever made, and which was at the time applauded by the vast number of Administrationists who heard it, and has ever been, I think, universally eulogized by them, he said:

"I will never sanction nor acquiesce in any warfare whatever upon the constitutional rights or domestic institutions of the people of the southern States. On the contrary, if there was an attempt to invade those rights, to stir up servile insurrection among their people, I would rush to their rescue, and interfere with whatever of strength I might possess to avert such a calamity."

The President, in his inaugural, declared that he had no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States in which it existed; that he believed he had no lawful right to, and had no inclination to, and that those who nominated and elected him did so with the full knowledge that he had made that and many similar declarations, and had never recanted them; and more than that, they placed in the platform for his acceptance, and as a law to themselves and him, the clear and emphatic resolution which he then read, which is the one of which I have spoken; after reading which he continued, saying:

"I now reiterate these sentiments; and in doing so I only press upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case is susceptible: that the property, peace, and security of no section are to be in any wise endangered by the now incoming Administration. I add, too, that all the protection which, consistently with the Constitution and laws, can be given, will be cheerfully given to all the States when lawfully demanded, for whatever cause, as cheerfully to one section as to another."

So after seven of the States to which this bill relates had so far defied the authority of the Government and repudiated the obligations of the Constitution as to have passed for itself an ordinance of secession, and had, on the 18th or 19th of February previous, formed a provisional insurrectionary government under the name of the confederate States of America. And although as he asserted in his message to the extra session in July thereafter, that at the beginning of his presidential term and four months before then, that "Within these States (referring to South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida, which were of such seven) all the forts, arsenals, dockyards, custom-houses, and the like, including the movable and stationary property in and about them, had been seized, and were held in open hostility to this Government, excepting only Forts Pickens, Taylor, and Jefferson, on and near the Florida coast, and Fort Sumter, in Charleston harbor, South Carolina. The forts thus seized had been put in improved condition; new ones had been built, and armed forces had been organized, and were organizing, all avowedly with the same hostile purpose.

"The forts remaining in the possession of the Federal Government in and near these States were either besieged or menaced by warlike preparations, and especially Fort Sumter was nearly surrounded by well-protected hostile batteries, with guns equal in quality to the best of its own, and outnumbering the latter as perhaps ten to one. A disproportionate share of the Federal muskets and rifles had somehow found their way into these States, and had been seized to be used against the Government. Accumulations of the public revenue, lying within them, had been seized for the same object. The Navy was scattered in distant seas, leaving but a very small part of it within the immediate reach of the Government. Officers of the Federal Army and Navy had resigned in great numbers; and of those resigning a large proportion had taken up arms against the Government.

"Simultaneously, and in connection with all this, the purpose to sever the Federal Union was openly avowed. In accordance with this purpose an ordinance had been adopted in each of these States, declaring the States, respectively, to be separated from the national Union. A formula for instituting a combined government of these States had been promulgated; and this illegal organization, in the character of confederate States, was already invoking recognition, aid, and intervention, from foreign Powers."

He said in that inaugural that the people who nominated and elected him did so with the full knowledge that he had declared that he had no right, inclination, or purpose so to interfere with slavery, and had never recanted such declarations, and held that they by making such part of such platform a law for him and them committed themselves and him against directly or indirectly interfering with slavery in the States where it existed, or the property, peace, and security of the people of any of them, which he, as he said, so repeated only to impress upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case was susceptible, that the property, peace, and security of no section were to be in any wise endangered by his Administration; thus, admitting, not only that slavery is included in the domestic institutions referred to in that portion of such platform, and that he could not have been elected, but for his often-expressed devotion to the principles therein enunciated before his nomination, and for its being known to those who nominated and elected him that he "had never recanted them." He, in that inaugural, moreover, stated that all the protection which could consistently with the Constitution and laws be given, would be cheerfully when demanded for any cause whatever; and moreover declared that—

"When hostility to the United States in any interior territory shall be so great and so universal as to prevent competent resident citizens from holding the Federal offices, there will be no attempt to force obnoxious strangers among people that object. While the strict legal right may exist for the Government to enforce the exercise of these offices, the attempt to do so would be so irritating and so nearly impracticable in that that I deem it better to forego for the time the uses of such offices."

Doubtless to assure the people of every section that he was so apprehensive of the results of the critical condition of the country that he would not, where in any interior country the hostility of the people was so great and universal against the Government of the United States as to prevent resident citizens from holding the offices, force obnoxious strangers on any people that object, and that he deemed it better for the time to forego the uses of such offices, and as if fearing that although his pledge was to every State in the Union most unequivocally, that on account of previously expressed adverse sentiments, and like political affinities, it might not be satisfactory to the people of the slaveholding ones, especially those of the seven States that were then as fully and completely as now in rebellion; as the crime of the act became as complete, though not so aggravated, by their renunciation of the authority of the Government, and their making preparations forcibly to resist it, as by their doing so with armies for any length of time, he adds "as cheerfully to one section as another," and continued, saying, "I take the official oath to-day with no mental reservation, and with no purpose to construe the Constitution and laws by any hypercritical rules." As an assurance to those of all the States of every section of the Union, and each of them, of such and equal protection, and, too, doubtless thinking that on such account either that the inhabitants of the slaveholding States, or many of them, or many of the most sagacious, prominent, and influential of his supporters or both would not be satisfied that he regarded either such portion of the platform or his emphatic exposition thereof and of the Constitution as embracing or having reference to the rendition of fugitive slaves, he continued thus:

"There is much controversy about delivering up of fugitives from service or labor. The clause I now read is as plainly written in the Constitution as any other of its provisions: 'No person held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any such law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up upon claim of such party to whom such labor or service is due.'"

And then said it is scarcely questioned that this provision was intended by those who made it for the reclaiming of what we call fugitive slaves; and the intention of the lawgiver is the law that all members of Congress swear their support to the whole Constitution, to this provision as well as any other; and that to the proposition, then, that slaves whose cases come within that clause should be delivered up, their oaths were unanimous, and continued thus: now, if they would make the effort in good temper, could they not with nearly equal unanimity frame and pass a law by which to keep good that unanimous oath, holding not only that the provision was as plainly written as any in the Constitution, that it applied to the rendition of fugitive slaves, that they should be delivered up, was the unanimous oath of all members of Congress? But added, could they not, if they would, make the effort in good temper, with nearly equal unanimity, pass a law by means of which to keep good that unanimous oath; and notwithstanding his declaration in that inaugural that all professed to be content in the Union if their constitutional rights could be maintained, and his not impugning their motives for such professions, though stating that their apprehensions were without reasonable cause, and that though he did not consider it necessary then to discuss those matters of administration about which there was no special anxiety or excitement, thereby holding no other matters of administration in such crisis worthy of comment in his inaugural than those relating to the provisions of the Constitution and portion of the Republican platform reiterated by him in it, and that such crisis had arisen from an attachment to the principles in such provision and portion of the platform enunciated, and apprehensions that they would be by his administration violated. And that he asked whether it was true that any right, plainly written in the Constitution, had been denied, and said he thought not; and that happily the human mind was so constituted that no party could reach the audacity of refusing such right. And then further said:

"Think you, if you can, of any instance in which a plainly written right of the Constitution has been denied, and that if by the force of numbers a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right, it might, in a moral point of view, justify revolution, that it certainly would if such right were a vital one."

And added that such is not the case, and that—

"All the vital rights of minorities and of individuals are so plainly assured to them by affirmatives and negatives, guarantees and prohibitions in the Constitution that controversies never arise concerning them."

Yet his party in Congress passed, and he signed, a bill repealing two fugitive slave laws, the one signed by Washington, in 1793, of which Daniel Webster, who never lived in a slave State nor owned a slave, in a speech, in Buffalo, New York, May 22, 1851, said:

"It was hardly opposed by any at the time, (referring to that of its passage.) The great men of New York and New England all concurred in it, and it answered all the purposes expected till about the year 1841 or 1842, when some of the States interfered to make enactments in opposition to it and imposing a penalty on any State officer who exercised authority under the law, or assisted in its execution. It had become absolutely indispensable that Congress should pass some law for the execution of this provision of the Constitution, or else give up that provision entirely. This is the question."

"I have already stated, gentlemen, what your observation of these things must have taught you. I will only recur to the subject for a moment, for the purpose of persuading you, as public men and private men, as good men and patriotic men, that you ought, to the extent of your ability and influence, to see to it that such laws are established and maintained as shall keep you, and the South, and the West, and all the country together, on the terms of the Constitution. I say what is demanded of us is to fulfill our constitutional duties, and do for the South what the South has a right to demand."

The bill for the other was most strenuously advocated by the most illustrious statesmen and self-sacrificing and venerated patriots then in Congress; Clay asserting, I think, that the necessity for it was one of the five bleeding wounds of the country, and Webster that it was more favorable to the fugitive slave than that of 1793; and in one in the Senate of the United States, that no slave had ever been reclaimed from Massachusetts under such a law, and that no false claim had ever been made for one in that State; and in another at Colby Springs, in June, 1851, he said:

"I do not hesitate to say and repeat, that if the northern States refuse willfully and deliberately to carry into effect that part of the Constitution which respects the restoration of fugitive slaves, the South would be no longer bound to observe the compact. A bargain broken on one side is a bargain broken on all sides."

And although he had held, when both these were in force, and seven of these States were in open and defiant rebellion, and some preparing and others threatening to unite with them, four of which did so very soon, that every member of Congress was oath bound to pass such a law, and that they might keep good that unanimous oath, advised them to, and assured the country that he nor Congress would withhold the right so conferred for the reclamation of fugitive slaves, by stating that happily the human mind was so constituted that no party could reach the audacity of denying a right plainly written in the Constitution, saying, at the time, after repeating the constitutional provision for the rendition of fugitives from labor; and stating that it applied to fugitive slaves, that it was as plainly written as any clause in the Constitution.

So the President and his party, which includes the supporters of this bill, according to such his authoritative declarations, have become guilty of that audacity which he thought, happily on account of the constitution of the human mind, no party could reach, and consequently more depraved than he then supposed human nature was; and, moreover, done what Webster said would release the slave States from our compact, and consequently Government, and given to such States what he then declared was certainly a moral cause for revolution, if the right of the reclamation of fugitive slaves is a vital one. Who doubts it, when it was by the framers of the Constitution regarded so much so, for the protection of twelve States, which were then slave, against but one, Massachusetts, which had become otherwise since or about the time of the signing of the Declaration of Independence; that the number of States required to ratify the Constitution would not have without such a provision in it. No sane man acquainted with the history of the country believes that the Union ever could have been formed with any Constitution not containing protection for a species of property held in twelve of the States, and which would not be subject to any law that could be made, either by any or all of them, if within the thirteenth. If vital then, and it certainly was if the Union could not have been formed without its having become a part of the Constitution, how much more so had it become at the time the President thus spoke of it, when there were twenty States and a number of Territories, the aggregate area of which was much greater than that of the slave States, and in all which, but for such a law, there would be no legal protection for such property; and when the hostility of many of the people of all such States and Territories to a right in that species of property was so great that in twelve of such States unconstitutional, revolutionary, and nullifying enactments had been passed, and, in some of them, enforced through sacrifice of life, to prevent the recovery of such property in the respective States into which, as probably all the twenty slaves had not only been enticed but forced against their will, the right is peculiarly vital, because, not only of the want of power in any State in which slavery exists to protect the owners thereof extra-territorially, but of the opportunities that slaves have and that are afforded them of evading the laws of any of the slave States, or that could be enacted by any of them.

As the right to the protection and recovery of property is highly important, no one can successfully controvert that this is a vital one until he has the right of such property, which the President admits. Do two laws of the importance that Daniel Webster, Clay, and Douglas attached to those of the kind confer no vital right? That the President thought they did must be evident to any one who has read his inaugural, as it will be that it was in consequence of his so regarding it that he spoke of a law of that kind and the imperative duty of Congress to pass one, and the audacity and fearful consequences of denying such a right, knowing that a large majority of the voters of the free States so held and believed that the withholding of it, or other rights of which he had spoken, permanently from any State, and much more section of the Union, would destroy it. If I have not shown that he so regarded it, and I insist that I have, his statement made in his message to the extra session of 1861, and more than two months after the commencement of the war, does. That he then did so believe, and promise such protection, and that he regarded it and all other constitutional rights as paramount in a rebellious war as peace, which is:

"Least there be some uneasiness in the minds of candid men as to what is to be the course of the Government toward the southern States, after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the Executive deems it proper to say it will be his purpose then, as ever, to be guided by the Constitution and the laws; and that he probably will have no different understanding of the powers and duties of the Federal Government relative to the rights of the States and the people under the Constitution than that expressed in the inaugural address. He desired to preserve the Government, that it might be administered for all, as it was administered by the men who made it."

As will that made in his emancipation proclamation nearly eighteen months after the commencement of the war, which is that thereafter, as theretofore, it would be prosecuted for the object of practically restoring the constitutional relations between the United States and the people thereof, in which States that relation was or might be suspended or disturbed, admitting in such message that with candid men (and not confining such admission to such of the slave States) there might be uneasiness as to what would be the course of his administration toward the southern States after the rebellion should have been suppressed, and reassuring the people of every section of the Union of full and equal protection then as ever; and, in such proclamation made some fourteen months thereafter, declared that the war that had then been raging for near eighteen months should be prosecuted, as it had been, for the purpose of practically restoring the constitutional relations between the United States and the people of these States, with which such relations had been suspended or disturbed. Not only by saying that such relations had been suspended or disturbed, holding that they had not been dissolved, and so far from intimating that any of their rights had been or could be forfeited, declared that the war should be continued for the purpose of practically restoring such relations, not only to the people of the States then in the rebellion, by which they had been suspended or disturbed, but to those of any other States, the relations of which with the Government might be so suspended or disturbed, through a rebellion against the United States. To any having any conception of such, and a knowledge of this bill, an effort to show that its every provision is subversive of the rights included in such relations would seem superfluous. Had I not demonstrated, as I believe I have, from the President's inaugural, his message and assurances in his emancipation proclamation, that he regarded the rebellion as consequent upon the apprehensions of those who became rebels, that the principles of self and free government contained in the resolution of the Republican platform on which he was elected, and reiterated in his inaugural, would be violated, and the provision of the Constitution requiring the rendition of fugitives from labor would be disregarded by him and those of his party who, with him, would control the administration of the Government during his term; and that, notwithstanding their rebellion and the war thereof, he would protect them in the enjoyment of such rights. The following, which he directed the Secretary of State to say to our minister to Great Britain, in a dispatch of April 10, 1861, shows that he regarded the rebellion as so consequent:

"It may be stated, perhaps, without giving just offense, that the most popular motive in these discontents [referring to the rebellion] was an apprehension of designs on the part of the incoming Federal Administration hostile to the institution of domestic slavery in the States where it is tolerated by local constitutions and laws. That institution and the class which especially cherishes it are not confined to the States which have revolted, but they exist in the eight other so-called slave States, and these for that reason sympathize profoundly with the revolutionary movement. Sympathies and apprehensions of this kind have, for an indefinite period, entered into the basis of political parties throughout the whole country, and thus considerable masses of persons, whose ultimate loyalty could not be doubted were found, even in the free States, either justifying, excusing, or palliating the movement toward disunion in the seceding States." * * *

"It would be very unjust to the American people to suppose that this singular and unhappy condition of things [alluding to the rebellion] indicated any extreme favor or toleration of the purpose of a permanent dissolution of the Union. On the contrary, disunion at the very first took on a specious form and it afterward made its way by ingenious and seductive devices."

months after the commencement of the war, especially as by the repeal of the fugitive slave law this Administration has deprived a section of this Union of a right the mere withholding of which I have, from authoritative declarations of the President, shown he considered violative of the oath of each member of Congress, and I think I have, that he did, a moral cause for revolution? I thus speak desiring a restoration of the Union, while preferring dissolution to permanent despotism under any Union; I need not add as it was that of our fathers, and that of the Constitution, as the Union is none other. While a Union may be a despotism, yet such an one can be established on the disruption of this, only by deceiving the people into the toleration of such an organization through deceptive professions for the restoration of the Union, and apparently sincere and enthusiastic devotion to its institutions, and seeming desire to restore them and reinvigorate its past glories, rendered apparently sincere and dazzlingly and successfully imposing by the display of our flag, the singing of national airs and other patriotic songs, and threatening and denouncing as traitors all who may question the sincerity of such professions, devotion, and desire.

I believe that without a change of Administration, or of its course, or unless the masses of the Administration party shall so generally appreciate the real political condition of the country and the cause thereof as to constrain those to whom they have given power to exercise it in the spirit that actuated those who framed the Constitution and administered the Government so long and successfully, in strict accordance with its provisions and as they promised to, that they might attain such power, the Union will be dissolved or such despotism established. Until such are convinced that this Administration has, by repeated violations of all the most important of the constitutional rights of the people of each of the States, justified the charges made by the most criminal, sagacious, and malicious of the people of each of the eleven States now in rebellion, and charges, too, so serious as to have involved so many of them of each of such States in the heinous crime of rebellion against a Government that they, as a people loved, and if administered on the basis of its organization, would desire to perpetuate with earth's time, and to have produced a calamity to the people of such States, on account of which, as Judge Douglas said in the speech to which I have referred, he would rush to their rescue, and interfere with whatever of strength he might possess to defend them from, they will not attain such appreciation, and may not in time to effect such restoration and avert such disruption or despotism, as a knowledge thereof would be incompatible with the existence of their party, and consequently can be obtained only against the unceasing, unrelaxing, and unscrupulous efforts of most of their leaders. To one unacquainted with the professions and purposes of most of the leaders of the party of the Administration, the apprehensions and excitement of the people of every State, consequent upon the inauguration of the President, must have seemed strange, when all, as he said, professed to be content with the Union if all their constitutional rights could be maintained, the sincerity of which he did not impugn, but stated that they were without reasonable cause.

And when the President instructed his Secretary of State to say in a dispatch of 22d April, 1861, and after the attack on Fort Sumter on the 12th of that month, to our minister to France, that there was not then, even in the midst of the gathering excitement of civil war, an American who declared his dissent from the Constitution, and assured them that the property, peace, and security of no section should be in anywise endangered by his Administration; and that all the protection that consistently with the Constitution and laws could be given, would be, as cheerfully to one section as the other, and especially, as the assurance comprehended all, that any who professed to be content in the Union with their constitutional rights maintained, or had never expressed dissent to the Constitution, should desire; but would not so seem to those cognizant that such popular purposes were professed to disguise real and abhorrent ones. And why? Because they were aware of the President's declaration, made at Springfield, Illinois, June 17, 1858, to a Republican convention that had just nominated him as the opponent of Judge Douglas for the Senate of the United States, which are:

"We are now far into the fifth year since a policy was initiated with the avowed object and confident promise of putting an end to slavery agitation. Under the operation of that policy that agitation has not only not ceased, but has constantly augmented. In my opinion it will not cease until a crisis shall have been reached and passed. 'A house divided against itself cannot stand.' I believe this Government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved; I do not expect the house to fall; but I do expect it will cease to be divided. It will become all one thing or all the other. Either the opponents of slavery will arrest the further spread of it, and place it where the public mind shall rest in the belief that it is in the course of ultimate extinction, or its advocates will push it forward till it shall become alike lawful in all the States, old as well as new, North as well as South."

And after having been convinced of the hostility of the majority of the people of that State to such sentiments, and hearing the exposures of Judge Douglas and others of them, said, (in a speech made in such canvass, 10th July thereafter, at Chicago:)

"Now, it is singular enough if you will carefully read that passage [referring to what I have just quoted] that I did not say that I was in favor of anything in it."

And that he, in that speech, said:

"We were often, (more than once, at least,) in the course of Judge Douglas's speech last night, reminded that this Government was made for white men; that he believed it was made for white men. Well, that is putting it into a shape in which no one wants to deny it."

Yet he, near the conclusion of the same speech, says:

"My friends, I have detained you about as long as I desired to do, and I have only to say, let us discard all this quibbling about this man and the other man, this race and that race and the other race being inferior, and therefore they must be placed in an inferior position; discarding our standard that we have left us. Let us discard all these things, and unite as one people throughout this land, until we shall once more stand up declaring that all men are created equal."

Thus, in the same speech, virtually admitting that the Government was made for white men, yet holding that it was quibbling to say that one man or race was inferior to another, and must therefore be placed in an inferior position, advised the discarding of the "standard" and "all these things" referring to the Government having been made for white men, and the inferiority in which the negro was held, and admonished the people to unite as one people throughout the land until they should once more stand up declaring that all men are created equal; and at Charleston, in the south part of that State, where the sentiments of the quotation that I have last made from him regarding the equality of the white and black races were as unpopular as they were popular at Chicago where he uttered them, he said in a speech in such canvass, and immediately after the commencing thereof, by stating in a very few prefatory words, the importance of the assemblage giving attention to his speech:

"While I was at the hotel to-day, an elderly gentleman called upon me to know whether I was really in favor of producing a perfect equality between the negroes and white people. While I had not proposed to myself on this occasion to say much on that subject, yet as the question was asked me I thought I would occupy perhaps five minutes in saying something in regard to it. I will say, then, that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races; that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

In view of the occasion of the utterance of such sentiments as were by the President at Springfield, which was to a State convention of the Republican party which had adopted a platform and just nominated him as the candidate of that party for the Senate of the United States, in response to and in acceptance of which the speech containing them was made, and of their importance by reason of their monstrosity consequent upon the declaration therein, that the Government could not exist as formed; and of the relation of the speaker to the convention and the country, and the high position assigned him by those to whom he thus spoke; and of everything connected therewith save the character of the President, it would, as he said afterward, "seem strange" that "he did not say that he was in favor of anything in it," especially as he and his radical friends claim that it was original with him, and as but for such expressions and known devotion thereto he would probably never have received that or a presidential nomination. And yet, to those well acquainted with the assumed author, or who have read the speeches to which I have adverted, would not so seem. While the President, in his speech at Chicago, advised that quibbling about one man or race being inferior to another, and should therefore be put in an inferior position, should be discarded, and that we should unite as one people throughout the land to discard the standard we have left us, and all these things, until we once more stand up declaring that all are equal. In that at Charleston he disclaimed being, or ever having been, in favor of affecting in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races, or of making voters or jurors of the latter, or qualifying them to hold office, or intermarry with white people; and declared that there was a physical difference between such races that he believed would forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality; and that as they could not so live, and as long as they did together, he was as much as any other man in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race.

He in such canyass did, in the northern section of the State, say that he hated slavery and insisted on its abolishment, while in other sections of it he would proclaim that "each State had the right to do exactly as it pleased about all their domestic relations, including that of slavery," and after admitting himself bound by constitutional obligations to allow the people of each of the States, without interference direct or indirect, to do exactly as they pleased, and denying that he had any impatience with such rights or inclination to interfere with them if there was no such constitutional provision; thus in one portion of the State not only denying any impatience with the institution of slavery, but any desire in any way to interfere with it even were it without constitutional sanction, thereby expressing more indifference to its existence; than to have said he did not care whether slavery was voted up or voted down, for the saying of which Judge Douglas was by the political adherents of the Administration traduced as a tyrant, monster, and being unworthy the name of an American citizen; and in another section of the State advising the abolition of the institution. And because of many such contradictory and astounding statements, before and previous to his first nomination as a candidate for President, made, and probably as often through design, attempted to be reconciled with conservatism, or qualified and explained for an emergency without in the least affecting his social or political relations with the most radical of the Abolitionists, to whom he became known, and a favorite candidate for the Presidency, in consequence of devotion to their heresies, and supposed availability on account of his remarkable faculty for successfully disguising them when expedient, and of his having received unprecedented majorities in each of the twelve States that had so nullified laws passed under such constitutional provision, and some of them the provision directly, and in every other northern State, New Jersey excepted, while he had no electoral vote in any slave State. Did time admit, I would state fully the bill and comment upon every provision thereof; but as it will not, nor of any satisfactory elaboration of any of those to which I shall, I will speak of the great and vital political principles involved in and violated by it, and not in detail of its enormities, as any one of its provisions characterizes all.

It provides, among other things, for the appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a provisional Governor for each of the States in rebellion; who is, until the United States shall have recognized a republican form of State government, to see that this act, the laws of the United States, and those of the State in force when, as it says, the State government was overthrown by the rebellion, are faithfully executed in the State, except that no law or usage whereby any one was held in involuntary servitude should be recognized or enforced by any court or officer in such State, and that the President shall appoint such officers provided for by the laws of the State, when, as it is said, its government was overthrown, as he may find necessary to the civil administration of the State.

That all persons declared free by any proclamation of the President, and their posterity, shall be forever free, and if restrained of liberty under pretense of claim to their service or labor, the courts of the United States shall, on habeas corpus, discharge them. That so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, the Governor shall cause, as speedily as may be, an enrollment to be taken preparatory to the election of delegates to a constitutional convention. That the convention shall declare on behalf of the people of the State their submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and adopt and incorporate into the constitution of the State three provisions in the act stated and thereby prescribed by the United States, in the execution of the constitutional duty to guaranty a republican form of government to every State, and that when it shall have adopted such provisions it shall proceed to reestablish a republican form of government and ordain a constitution containing them, one of which is that involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and that freedom and equality of civil rights before the law is guarantied to all persons in the State; and that if it shall refuse to establish the State government on such conditions the Governor shall declare it dissolved. But that it shall be the duty of the President, whenever he shall have reason to believe that a sufficient number of the people of the State entitled to vote under the act prescribed, and not less than a majority of those enrolled, as required by the bill, are willing to reestablish a State government on such conditions, to direct the Governor to order another election of delegates to a convention, for the purpose and in the manner prescribed in the act, and proceed in all respects as therein provided to dissolve the convention or certify the State government reestablished by it to the President.

The powers of this body, though of more extensive operation than those of Representative Houses of the States, are in their nature and quality much inferior, being conferred by delegation over special and expressly specified though general matters, enumerated in the Constitution, which so clearly defines and limits them as to exclude any whatever not so specified, and are, therefore, permissive; while those of such bodies of the States are inherent and consequently not prescribed, and though limited by constitutional prohibitions, are supreme over all matters not so prohibited. The question that the introduction of a bill here should first present for our consideration is, are its provisions within the powers so enumerated? and not whether they are prohibited by the Constitution; and if not, we should, without regard to what they are, oppose the passage of such a bill, and especially if it professes to guaranty to States republican forms of government, when they have such, and while its provisions, if enforced, would cement such governments into monarchical ones, and would, though such provisions were in themselves, and unconnected with the relations of the States to the United States, as republican and perfect as those of this bill are infamous and intolerably usurping, for the reason that any alteration made in such governments, or restriction imposed upon their reserved rights by any other administration than their own, is not only despotic but a usurpation, against which the United States, under the provision of the Constitution on which it is claimed this bill is framed, is bound to protect each State, though perpetrated by Congress and the Executive, or either, or any power, because each of such States is a commonwealth, and the people of each thereof have the normal and exclusive prerogative expressly admitted, I will not say conferred, by the Constitution of the United States, as they were never delegated by the States to the United States, of retaining or altering their respective governments, however immoral, sinful, degrading, or obnoxious such governments may be, or might be made by such alteration, in the estimation of the people, or the administration of each other State of the Union, or of that of the latter, if they remain republican, never having surrendered the power to politically do with regard thereto and to all other of their reserved rights, which God gave them personally to, to do wrong, to sin, and cannot enjoy the franchises of Commonwealths, republican institutions, nor States of this Union, longer than they retain such prerogative, the exercise of which, by any other power than that of their respective administrations is subversive of such governments, and consequently a usurpation of such prerogative. Each State having republican forms of government, if they ever had, nine of them having each a government established by the people thereof, formed that of which we are the Representatives, Virginia, Georgia, and South Carolina, included in this bill, being three thereof, and four more having become members of the Union, by signing and ratifying the Constitution, and in accordance with its provisions, of which North Carolina, so included in this bill, is one. And the remainder of them, by admission under a clause of it authorizing Congress to admit others, the governments of which are republican in form, is evidence so conclusive that they had, that to controvert it, is to, that, that of the United States, ever was; and the supporters of this bill do not openly, within my knowledge.

It is unnecessary for the proper consideration of this bill further to investigate its provisions than to ascertain whether it proposes to alter any such governments, which is an attempt to overthrow them, or which, if possible, with any administration of this Government, the Government could no more survive than could man the act of suicide. That it does not will not be denied by any, having regard for their reputation, who have examined it; and although it does, can any who favor its passage consistently disclaim the power of Congress so to legislate for any other State of the Union without first establishing superior and exclusive rights of such other States under the Constitution of the United States or forfeiture of rights thereunder of those included in this bill? Yet its advocates, knowing that this Union was organized on the principle of the equality of each of the States, and that such equality is not only the most sublime of their rights, but of the attributes of our Government; and that in such sublimity of rights and attributes there is no inherent conflict; and that the masses of the people whose minds are unperverted by the fanaticism inculcated by most of the leaders of this Administration, who alone hold and teach otherwise, and that clandestinely so believe they neither assume such superiority nor claim such forfeiture of rights of any of the States; nor without self-stultification could they, as in the bill they are regarded as States. Such equality is proclaimed by the authority of each House of Congress when in session through its respective flags unfurled to signalize our deliberations, on which the equality of each of the States is represented by a similar star, as it is by national devices of peace and war, and over all which in patriotic contemplation: the American eagle, with intense anxiety, has ever hovered, and now lingers with awful and depressing suspense; and as an admonitor of our duty as prescribed by the Constitution, and a witness of our fidelity or recreancy thereto, wings you, Mr. Speaker, to and from that stand to in front of the images of Washington and La Fayette sanction the opening, continuing, and closing of all our proceedings over which you preside.

The bill proposes to establish for each of such States a provisional government, for the administration of which there is to be but one officer, a Governor, to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless the President, in the exercise of a discretion conferred on him, should appoint others; during which the people to be so governed are disfranchised so far as regards not only the administration of such governments, but as to the time and manner of, under the dictation of this bill, establishing a permanent, so-called State government; and as to the qualifications of those who are to compose the convention therefore and of the voters by whom they are to be elected; and as to the rules and regulations under which such persons are to be elected, so the people of these States may be in accordance with this bill, and in the discretion of the President reduced to and held under the power of a Governor alone, so long as the President and Governor may desire, and more, to that of such Governor, with or without such other officers as the President may determine, so long as such Governor may wish, without regard to the desire or action of the President or any other person or power, which, in the one event would be the most perfect of despotisms, the government of one man; and in the other, the next, that of the government of one man and such others as another man may appoint; and in either case to endure with the will of the Governor; in the choice of none of whom could the people, so degraded and tortured, exercise any preference, not being permitted to vote, nor represented in any legislative body.

Why do I assert that such people may be so governed? Because the President would not be bound by the bill to appoint for any of such States any other officer than a Governor, and such other officers provided for by the laws of the State, when its government, as is therein stated, was overthrown, as he might find necessary for the civil administration of the State, of which he would be the only judge, and therefore would not be compelled to appoint any other than a Governor. And as the bill provides that so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, the Governor shall cause an enrollment to be taken preparatory to the election of delegates to a constitutional convention, of which suppression and obedience he is the sole judge, and consequently not bound ever to have such enrollment taken, without which there can be no election or convention, although such resistance may have ceased and such obedience be ever so perfect, and every man in the world might desire that he should: If to this it should be replied that the President can discharge the man acting as Governor and appoint his successor, I would reply that he, no more than his predecessor, would under any circumstances be bound to cause such enrollment to be taken. But suppose the Governor does, and a constitution is framed in conformity with the bill, and Congress refuses to recognize their government as republican in form, a Governor, under the provisions of the bill, would have to govern it as if no such constitution had been framed, as the bill requires that the government of each of such States is to be administered by a Governor, with such other officers as I have named, as the President might find necessary for the purpose, until it has, as therein provided, established a government which the United States shall have recognized as republican in form. And should a bill be passed by Congress so recognizing such government, and the President veto it, such State would, under the provisions of this bill, be so governed, unless the bill should be passed by a majority of two thirds of each House of Congress, which would not be probable unless there were such or near such a majority in each House opposed to the Administration, as such question would ordinarily be a party one under such an Administration as this.

If to this it is said that no State can be admitted into the Union without the passage of a bill by Congress and its approval by the President, or passage by a vote of two thirds of each House thereof, in case he vetoes it, I should say that the admission of a State into the Union presented no such question, in which I would be sustained by this bill, which recognizes them as States in the Union. And if further said that no bill can become a law of Congress without such approval, or being so passed, I would reply that Congress has no power so to legislate with regard to any State of the Union, and that therefore the probability of such contingencies may be properly urged against its so doing, while it should not be against legitimate legislation; and I believe, from my knowledge of the machinations of those who control the administration of this Government, that most of them would embrace the opportunity which the passage and executive approval of this bill would give them of so tyrannizing over the people of such States, for the gratification of the hatred of themselves and adherents to the people of such States, not only on account of some of their institutions, but of their detestation of the reserved rights of the States, both which, until the incoming of this Administration, have ever been sanctioned not only by all the departments of this Government and all its statesmen, but professedly by this Administration, through the legislative and executive departments of the Government, as from the action of the Executive further appears from an extract from a dispatch of the Secretary of State of April 10, 1861, to our minister to Great Britain, written by the direction of the President, and which is as follows:

"You will not be allowed, however, even if you were disposed, as the President is sure you will not be, to rest your opposition to the application of the confederate States on the ground of any favor this Administration or the party which chiefly called it into existence [referring, doubtless, to the abolition party] proposes to show to Great Britain or claims that Great Britain ought to show to them; you will not consent to draw into debate before the British Government any opposing moral principles which may be supposed to lie at the foundation of the controversy between those States and the Federal Union; you will indulge in no expressions of harshness, or disrespect, or even impatience, concerning the seceding States, their agents, or their people; but you will, on the contrary, all the while remember that these States are now, as they always heretofore have been, and notwithstanding their temporary self-delusion, they must always continue to be, equal and honored members of this Federal Union, and that their citizens, throughout all political misunderstanding and alienations, still are and always must be our kindred and countrymen. In short, all your arguments must belong to one of three classes, namely: first, arguments drawn from the principles of public law and natural justice which regulate the intercourse of equal States; secondly, arguments which concern equally the honor, welfare, and happiness of the discontented States and the honor, welfare, and happiness of the whole Union; thirdly, arguments which are equally conservative of the rights and interests and even sentiments of the United States, and just in their bearing upon the rights, interests, and sentiments of Great Britain and all other nations."

The bill declares that all persons declared free by any proclamation of the President shall be forever free; and if restrained of liberty under pretense of claim to their service or labor, the courts of the United States shall on habeas corpus discharge them. Such courts compose one of the three departments of this Government—the judicial; and while they are termed coordinate, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are the highest national authority on all questions of which it has cognizance, and no act or enactment of Congress, or act of the Executive—the other two departments of the Government—either is, if in contravention of such a decision, valid. Yet this bill, by providing that such courts shall on habeas corpus discharge such person, commands them to, although it is one of the prerogatives of such courts to determine whether any enactment of Congress is a law, and their oath-bound duty to, if they believe it unconstitutional, to declare it a nullity. And the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States is final and conclusive thereof. Were it not, our Constitution would be inoperative upon the other two departments of the Government, and the people would be subjected to their unrestrained will, and consequently not free, nor the Government republican. Would not such a command be most audacious, even did such slave become free by the provisions of this bill, should it receive the sanctions necessary to make laws, or had they by any proclamation of the President? Because it is an attempt to deprive those courts of a right inherent with every court, which is the exercise of judgment, without which there can be really no decision, as the decision of a court is but the determination of the judgment of the judge, or of the necessary concurring number of them where the court is composed of more than one, expressed in proper form; and if so audacious in such case, how inexpressibly so, if they did not nor would so become free. The Representatives in this House of the then called Republican, now Administration party, on 11th February, A. D. 1861, when they were in the majority, voted nearly unanimously for the following resolutions, which were passed with few dissenting votes:

"Resolved, That neither the Federal Government nor the people or governments of the non-slaveholding States have a purpose or a constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any of the States of the Union."

"Resolved, That those persons in the North who do not subscribe to the foregoing proposition are too insignificant in number and influence to excite the serious attention or alarm of any portion of the Republic, and that the increase of their numbers and influence does not keep pace with the increase of the aggregate population of the Union."

And on the 3d of March, 1863, passed a bill authorizing the President, whenever in his judgment the public safety might require it, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in any case throughout the United States, or any part thereof, during the present rebellion, in violation of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress to only when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it, but not to confer such right on the President or any one. That Congress may, on believing such necessity to exist, suspend such privilege, I suppose, scarcely if at all questioned. If so, how can it be maintained that in the power so to determine with regard to and so suspend a writ of such vast importance, is included that of delegating such power to any, and yet it is not even assumed that the power so to determine or suspend, or to empower another to, is conferred in any other part of the Constitution?

So, though by that resolution the representatives of that party nearly unanimously held that they in the North who thought that the Federal Government had the constitutional right to interfere with slavery in any of the States of the Union were insignificant in number and influence; and if the Federal Government cannot constitutionally so interfere how can Congress by legislation or the President by proclamation? And such representatives so provided for the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus by their President for which he issued such proclamation, and most of the leaders of that party are through it and this bill and like means endeavoring to abolish slavery and establish for the negro superiority of civil rights by requiring such judges to discharge any of them on writ of habeas corpus for their freedom, while imprisoning white men opposed to such designs without informing them, though beseeched to, of the cause thereof, and denying to them such writ and therefore the privilege through a trial and the judgment of a court of securing their freedom from the confines of felons' cells, though extending to the negro an immunity thereupon never asked nor enjoyed by white men, who consider the privilege of such writ, which only entitles any one to a trial on which he may or may not be discharged, one of the greatest of political rights and only guarantee of the freedom of persons; and of which all are in certain cases deprived by those endeavoring to secure for the negro such discharge and freedom in violation of the Constitution and laws as previously construed by themselves, the courts, and all jurists and statesmen, in disregard of the judgment of the court required to order such discharge, and consequently through perjury of any judge who should order such a discharge believing this act and the proclamation of emancipation to be unconstitutional. And in all cases without trial, as a trial by a court implies the right of the judge to decide, which in such a case would result in a remand or discharge.

And although the President, after the commencement of the war, instructed his Secretary of State to say in a dispatch to our minister to France, 22d April, 1861, that any effort on his part to so interfere with slavery, as existing under the Constitution and laws, would be unconstitutional, and all his acts in that direction would be prevented by the judicial authority, even though they were assented to by Congress and the people, and in one thereafter, I think to our minister to Great Britain, the date of which I do not remember, that

"It seems as if the extreme advocates of slavery and its most vehement opponents were acting in concert together to precipitate a servile war, the former by making the most desperate attempts to overthrow the Federal Union, the latter by demanding an edict of universal emancipation as a lawful and necessary, if not, as they say, the only legitimate way of saving the Union."

And in resisting a pressure made upon him for the issuing of such an one, but a short time before he proclaimed it, said that it would be inoperative, and has repeatedly, and I suppose always when expressing a determination to adhere to it, or requiring oaths to support or obey it, so qualified such determination, support, and obedience, as to conform to whatever might be the decision of the Supreme Court; and particularly in his proclamation of amnesty; and John Q. Adams, who more than any other is claimed as authority for the validity of such a proclamation, when minister to England, in 1815, and Secretary of State, in 1820, and as such held that slaves taken by the British in the late war with Great Britain, or who had fled to them for refuge, were not by the law or usages of war confiscable; and in a dispatch of July 7, 1820, to Mr. Rush, then our minister to England, that "the principle is that the emancipation of enemies' slaves is not among the acts of legitimate war; as it relates to the owners, it is a destruction of private property, nowhere warranted by the usages of war." And in one to Mr. Middleton, then our minister to Russia, to the emperor of which had been referred the arbitrament of the removal of such slaves, that "no such right is acknowledged," referring to that claimed of confiscation as a law of war by writers who admit any limitation. The right of putting to death all prisoners in cold blood and without special cause might as well be pretended to be a law of war, or the right to use poisoned weapons, or to assassinate.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

And that although such bill further provides that all slaves declared free by any proclamations of the President shall be emancipated and forever free, thereby tacitly admitting a doubt as to whether they became so by virtue of any such proclamation, as did its authors and advocates here by their support of the resolution recommending the amendment of the Constitution for the abolition of slavery, at least indicate an opinion that Congress cannot emancipate slaves, and that too although all such proclamations are most clearly unconstitutional, and would be so held by the Supreme Court upon a proper case, in commendable disregard of and supreme and becoming contempt of this bill should it be passed by Congress and approved by the Executive. That the Supreme Court would, as the President instructed his Secretary of State officially to say on 22d April, 1861, prevent any such interference with slavery as he attempts by such proclamation must appear to any who will read the extracts from an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Brown vs. United States, made at the February term, 1814, and delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, who was one of the most distinguished of all jurists, and probably knew more law intuitively than any other, and whose opinions are high precedents wherever the common law is known, and which opinion is reported commencing on 110th page of 8th Cranch, reports of that court, and in which the court held:

"That the modern rule would, then, seem to be that tangible property belonging to an enemy and found in the country at the commencement of war, ought not to be immediately confiscated; and in almost every commercial treaty an article is inserted stipulating for the right to withdraw such property. That this rule appears to be totally incompatible with the idea that war does of itself vest the property in the belligerent Government. It may be considered as the opinion of all who have written on the jus belli, that war gives the right to confiscate, but does not itself confiscate the property of the enemy, and their rules go to the exercise of this right.

"That the Constitution of the United States was framed at a time when this rule, introduced by commerce in favor of moderation and humanity, was received throughout the civilized world. In expounding that Constitution, a construction ought not lightly to be admitted which would give to a declaration of war an effect in this country it does not possess elsewhere, and which would fetter that exercise of entire discretion respecting enemy's property which may enable the Government to apply to the enemy the rule that he applies to us.

"That if we look to the Constitution itself we find this general reasoning much strengthened by the words of that instrument, and that the declaration of war has only the effect of placing the two nations in a state of hostility, of producing a state of war, of giving those rights which war confers, but not of operating, by its own force, any of those results, such as a transfer of property, which are usually produced by ulterior measures of Government, is fairly deducible from the enumeration of powers which accompanies that of declaring war: 'Congress shall have power' to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water."

"That the proposition that a declaration of war does not, in itself, enact a confiscation of the property of the enemy within the territory of the belligerent is believed to be entirely free from doubt. Is there in the act of Congress by which war is declared against Great Britain any expression which would indicate such an intention?

"That it appears to the court that the power of confiscating enemy property is in the legislature, and that the legislature has not yet declared its will to confiscate property which was within our territory at the declaration of war. The court is therefore of the opinion that there is error in the sentence of condemnation pronounced in the circuit court in this case, and doth direct that the same be reversed and annulled, and that the sentence of the district court be affirmed."

By which the court held that neither war nor a declaration thereof of itself enacts the confiscation of the property of the enemy within the territory of the belligerent, and that such property so found, even after the declaration of war and during its continuance, cannot be condemned as enemy's property without a legislative act authorizing its confiscation. So, to authorize the confiscation of property, there must not only be such war, but a legislative enactment authorizing such confiscation, and a judicial decision thereupon and therefor, to which the action of all the departments of the Government, the legislative, judicial, and executive, is essential, that of the Executive as such strictly, and in the approval of bills and resolutions of Congress, and not as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, for as such his acts for confiscation of such property would be as void as the edict of any monarch of any other country. And Justice Story, though dissenting from the judgment of the court in delivering his dissenting opinion, held that until the title should be divested by some overt act of the Government and some judicial sentence, the property would unquestionably remain in the hostile owners, and if peace should intervene it would be completely beyond the reach of subsequent condemnation. According to which no slave has ever become free by virtue of such proclamation, and cannot only through some judicial sentence pronounced during the continuance of the war. Yet such proclamation has none of those sanctions, without all of which there can be no confiscation of such property. Nor does it claim to have, as the commencement of it is, "I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States of America, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy thereof," and is such an one as characterizes presidential proclamations of an exclusively warlike as contradistinguished from those of a civil nature. Nor did he or his supporters who were its advocates pretend that it had, and they having justified it only as a military necessity and an indispensable means, and therefore only justifiable for successfully conducting the war for the restoration of the Union only, and repudiated as most slanderously false, and as did most of them as traitorous, the charge that it was in the least an object for which the war was to be conducted. Yet it is the paramount one with them, notwithstanding the official assurances of which I have spoken of, the President and his political adherents, who include every supporter of this bill, that the constitutional rights of the people of such States should be alike cheerfully protected, and that he in a conversation with the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, then, as now, a member, and other members of Congress from slave States, said to him:

"Mr. Mallory, this war, so far as I have anything to do with it, is carried on on the idea that there is a Union sentiment in these States, which, when set free from the control now held over it by the presence of the confederate or rebel power, will be sufficient to replace those States in the Union. If I am mistaken in this, if there is no such sentiment there, if the people of those States are determined with unanimity, or with a feeling approaching to unanimity, that their States shall not be members of this confederacy, it is beyond the power of the people of the other States to force them to remain in the Union; in that contingency—in the contingency that there is not that sentiment there—this war is not only an error, but it is a crime."

Not only committing himself as an anti-coercionist and denying the power of the people of the other States to coerce such States to remain in the Union, thereby admitting that they were, if the people thereof were determined with unanimity, or feeling approaching it, not to, and that under such circumstances the war which he said he was conducting upon the idea that their feelings were otherwise for the purpose of relieving them from the control of the confederate or rebel power, was not only an error but a crime. So the President was then not only an anti-coercionist, but held that under such circumstances it was an error and a crime to be a coercionist.

Would not the degradation of our Government and people become sufficient for the gratification of the cruel and morbid cravings and vengeance of the most malignant and depraved under the operation of this bill, did it contain no provision requiring judges to discharge negroes on habeas corpus for their freedom; as it provides for a despotism in each of the States in rebellion; and for the abolishment of slavery and equality of civil rights therein in the contingencies which I have mentioned?

One of the designs of some of the advocates of this bill is to so oppress and reduce the white inhabitants of these States that they will, for relief from physical suffering, consent to the degradation of the establishment of equal civil rights between themselves and the negro race, between which races there is such an intellectual inequality and physical difference as to render political or social equality most offensive to all the former, save but the few of them so desiring. And such political equality would be degrading to the white race, and to the extent that it might result in amalgamation, an inevitable consequence, would in time extinguish both races, as would such social one increase such degradation and amalgamation and enervate the white race; while a denial of the latter to a race though so inferior and physically repulsive and so generally held in bondage, when possessing such a political one, would result in a war of races. And if so, and who doubts it, such political equality would produce, through a social one, such enervation, increase such degradation and amalgamation, or on account of such denial, such a war, and would as effectually degrade the national as the State governments, and render this a mongrel, enfeebled, and decaying republic, as the rights so conferred on the negro by such State governments would inure to him as to and all in all the departments of the General Government, in which he would be a political peer with his white associates and colleagues, and as such participate in making, expounding, and executing laws for the people of every State in the Union.

Under the operation of the bill, should it receive the sanctions which ordinarily make bills laws, would slavery remain the same? Would the rights of the rebellious States and every human being in them remain subject to the same laws and powers of administration, or would such States be governed as tyrannically as any conquered people ever were? They would. Although the President, after the commencement of the war, directed the Secretary of State, in the dispatch to our minister to France to which I have referred, to say:

"The condition of slavery in the several States will remain the same whether the revolution succeed or fail."

"There is not a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail, for the rights of the States and every human being in them will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration whether the revolution shall succeed or whether it fail."

"They [referring to the framers of the Constitution] did not expect that the practice of African slavery should be abruptly terminated to the prejudice of the peace and economy of the country. They therefore placed the entire control of slavery as it was then existing beyond the control of the Federal authorities by leaving it to remain subject to the exclusive management and disposition of the several States themselves, and fortified it there with a provision for the return of fugitives from labor and service, and another securing an allowance of three fifths of such persons in fixing the basis of direct taxation and representation."

And in one to our minister to England of the 10th April, 1861, that—

"For these reasons the President would not be disposed to reject a cardinal doctrine of theirs [the rebels] namely, that the Federal Government could not reduce the seceding States to obedience by conquest, even though he were disposed to question that proposition. But, in fact, the President willingly accepts it as true. Only an imperial or despotic Government could subjugate thoroughly disaffected and insurrectionary members of the State. This Federal republican system of ours is of all forms of government the very one which is most unfitted for such labor."

That every promise so made has been wantonly violated comment to show would be superfluous, as it would to demonstrate that the tyranny exercised by the Administration over the people of the adhering States was necessary to effect the designs of those who control it against those of the rebellious States, and that the degradation to which the former have been reduced is the result of such use of such means and the operation of the law of the organization of our Government; any violation of which as against any member of the Union inevitably affects every other, as has that of the rights of the States in rebellion by enthroning despotism without even the aid of its usual concomitants, hereditary legislation, primogeniture, and vast accumulations of property with the few, where patriots who as our public servants gave renown to our country sat, and such despotism as has so far divested the people of each State of their vested rights, that none of them so fully enjoy the immunity of popular suffrages, local legislation, benefit of laws, liberty of conscience, privilege of habeas corpus, free speech, free press, or trial by jury, without which there is none for life, reputation, home, liberty, or property, as do the subjects of many thrones and all which are guaranteed by acts of British freedom. And yet such despotism, notwithstanding the professions, pledges, and assurances made to the people of this and other countries, and violated, of which I have spoken, and many more has become so powerful and at times so defiant and audacious that its chief, in a letter of the 4th of April last, to A. G. Hodges, of Frankfort, Kentucky, and before his renomination for the Presidency, stated that he "felt that measures otherwise unconstitutional might become lawful by becoming indispensable to the preservation of the Constitution through the preservation of the nation. Right or wrong, I assumed this ground, and now I avow it;" and although he in his inaugural said that he had taken his official oath without mental reservation, and had proclaimed the supremacy of the Constitution, and his devotion thereto and determination to maintain it, and officially admitted its efficiency in this or any other crisis by instructing his Secretary of State to say in a dispatch of the 10th of April, 1861, to our minister at Great Britain, that—

Reconstruction—Mr. Smith.

"You will make no admissions of weakness in our Constitution, or of apprehension on the part of the Government. You will rather prove, as you easily can by comparing the history of our country with that of other States, that its Constitution and Government are really the strongest and surest which have ever been enacted for the safety of any people."

He nevertheless through the power, terror, promises, blandishments, and smiles of such despotism procured his reelection. Is it not remarkable that any one should feel that measures otherwise unconstitutional could under any circumstances become lawful unless he regards the Constitution as the subject of circumstances, or that the preservation of the creature (the nation) should become indispensable to that through which it was created (the Constitution)?

As it would in at least one case if it should ever become necessary to preserve the Constitution through the preservation of the nation, as the Government was created through the Constitution and can never survive it. And is it not alarming that a President having such erroneous conceptions of the Constitution our form of Government and of the relations of the one to the other, has, as he says, assumed "that ground" and to arrogate and exercise powers regardless of the Constitution whenever he may think them indispensable to preserve the Constitution through the preservation of the nation, and consequently without limitation? His acts no more than his desires, under such determination, will be controlled by the Constitution, and he will rule as he desires without any constitutional restraints whatever, and is consequently a President at will of a constitutional Government. And having done what he has under acknowledged constitutional restraints, what will he not do after having, as he says, "right or wrong," assumed such "ground," and having thereafter secured his renomination and reelection?

RECONSTRUCTION.

SPEECH OF HON. G. CLAY SMITH, OF KENTUCKY,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 21, 1865.

On the special order, being the reconstruction bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, while all true Union men differ in no respect whatever in the great and absorbing idea of prosecuting the war for the suppression of the rebellion and the restoration of the Union to peace, order, and liberty, it does not follow that there must be mixed with that idea, and inseparable from it, another dangerous, impolitic, and unnecessary proposition, that there can be no Union, no peace, no establishment of law and order, without not only the utter disregard of former rights of the citizen in the rebellious States, universal confiscation of real and personal estates, not only the total abolition of slavery, but the perfect equality in all respects of the African race with the white. Amid the melancholy and terrific scenes of the day, with the bloody and devastating war all over the land, inaugurated and persevered in by an ambitious people for a separate independence, the perpetuation and propagation of a peculiar institution, violating all the rules of well-regulated government, the Constitution and laws of the best and most beneficent country in the world, it is not strange that those loyal to the Government should be united in their feelings and unyielding purpose to put down that rebellion with whatever force, expense, and sacrifice necessary or required. Hence the first proposition I make needs no debate, and I will not occupy the time of the House in discussing it.

But the question of what shall be done with these people, their lands and other property, as they are brought back again within our jurisdiction, is a serious, important, and commanding one. It is in fact the question before Congress; it is the question before the country; it is the question in restoring peace, and bringing our once happy land back to its original greatness, strength, and glory. Not only is it the question to bring us back to that position, but upon its proper solution and settlement depend the rapid advancement, the full development, and high stand of our great country in the catalogue of nations, and reaching that point so much desired and prayed for by every American citizen.

In voting, therefore, for or against the bill before the House, I beseech gentlemen to consider well, observe the present surroundings; look, as the mariner, tempest-tossed and driven from his latitude into dangerous and unknown seas, at the chart; mark the courses well; be sure you are in the right direction; hold firm to the rudder; look also ahead, see where we are going; and into what port we are to enter; then throw the sails to the wind.

The insurrectionist, the bad man, the persistent and headlong violator of law, the bandit and guerrilla, must be punished, must be gotten rid of, and made feel the terror of the law, the power of the Government; with others, not in the spirit of revenge, unkindness, maliciousness, nor inhumanity, but as a kind parent would punish a child, nay, punish severely, for the benefit of the child, the happiness and prosperity of the family, obeying a great and commanding duty, a law of humanity and of God—so would I propose and adopt a rule toward them. As a child is indebted for its existence, its nurture, its life, its all to the parent, and therefore owes a reciprocal duty of obedience, kindness, and defense; and for a failure to perform these high natural and legal duties, punishment, by human and divine law, by every consideration of right and justice is ordained and should be executed against him; so should legitimate condemnation and punishment be visited upon those who have violated the obligations they were under to the Government, their disregard of the Constitution, the nullification of the laws, and above all for the magnitudinous and almost unpardonable offense of raising their hands and striking at the very life and future of their mother country, the Government of the United States.

I do not doubt the right nor the power of the Government, under the Constitution, to punish treason by trial, judgment, and execution. The Constitution declares he who commits treason shall die; and the people owe it to themselves for present and future protection to execute this wise, fundamental, and statutory law; and so far as I am apprised all the legislation of Congress has been alone to do that which the Constitution and interest of our country demanded.

The confiscation of property possessed by insurgents, rebels, traitors, is a right belonging to every Government, and one which has never been denied. It is a legitimate punishment inflicted upon those who commit the highest crime known to the law. Examples on this point are numerous; the history of the Revolution of 1776 is replete with evidence on this subject; and there is no less reason to-day, in times like these, for the faithful and rigid execution of such a rule or law than there was in the beginning and infancy of this Republic.

The fathers of the Republic believed it an essential prerogative, an imperative duty, a legitimate right, not only to bring the offender to punishment but to confiscate his property. January 6, 1776, General Washington said, in a letter to Governor Cooke:

"I am informed that the Connecticut Assembly are very unanimous in the common cause; and, among other acts, have passed one for raising and equipping a fourth of their militia." * * * "Another act for restraining and punishing persons inimical to us, and directing proceedings therein, &c." * * * "Another act for seizing and confiscating for the use of the colony the estates of those putting or continuing to shelter themselves under the protection of the ministerial fleet or army, or assisting them in carrying on their measures against us." * * * "The situation of our affairs seems to call for regulations like these, and I should think the other colonies ought to adopt similar ones, or such of them as they had not already made."

Thus, sir, did the Father of his Country, he who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," advise the people fighting for their independence, their happiness, and their liberties. Not only were the absolute rebels, the men with arms in their hands, subjected to this rigid rule, but also those who assisted the Tories "in carrying on their measures against the colonies."

So also Benjamin Franklin, on the 7th day of June, 1782, said:

"There can be little doubt that every society may rightfully banish from among them those who aim at its subversion, and forfeit the property which they can only be entitled to by the laws and under the protection of the society which they attempt to destroy."

Again, said Franklin, June 26, 1785:

"But we differ a little in our sentiments respecting the loyalists (as they call themselves), and the conduct of America toward them." * * * "Even the example you propose of the English Commonwealth's restoring the estates of the loyalists after their being subdued, seems rather to countenance and encourage acting differently, as probably if the power which always accompanies property had not been restored to the loyalists, if their estates had remained confiscated and their persons had been banished, they could not have so much contributed to the restoration of kingly power, and the new government of the republic might have been more durable."

So also was the colony of Maryland prompt and decisive in her action on this subject. In a convention of deputies, on the 4th day of July, 1776, an ever-memorable day, was emphatically declared and published the following resolution:

"Resolved, That if any inhabitant of this colony shall, after the 5th of August next, within or without this colony," * * * "levy war against the United Colonies, or any of them, &c., such person, on conviction thereof," * * * "shall suffer death, without benefit of clergy, and forfeit all the real estate which he had at the time of the commission of the crime, to be applied to the use of the colony."

Subsequent to the passage of this resolution, the history of that colony shows that property was confiscated, and that persons were severely punished. The Loyalist of the American Revolution, volume one, page 80, says:

"Maryland seized, confiscated, and appropriated all property of persons in allegiance to the British Crown, and appointed commissioners to carry out the terms of their statutes which were passed to effect these purposes."

I might stop here, Mr. Speaker, and content myself with the belief that these were examples enough from the original history of the Republic to sustain my point; but in these days of caving and disregard of the advice and warning of our fathers I will ask indulgence a little further. Pennsylvania, that proud old Keystone State, the State I love and honor, and that has done so much for the Union, far back in the beginning of our Government, through her patriots and statesmen, gave lessons of justice, protection, and wisdom which will be of great service to gentlemen now present, if they would but heed them. Pennsylvania, on the 5th of March, 1776, passed an act, the preamble of which reads: "Whereas Government ought at all times to take the most effective measures for the safety and security of the States." It ordained and declared:

"That all and every" * * * "person and persons," * * * "owing allegiance to the State of Pennsylvania, who, from and after the public ization hereof, shall levy war against the State or be adherent to the King of Great Britain or others, the enemies of this State, or to the enemies of the United States of America, by giving him or them aid or assistance within the limits of this State or elsewhere, and shall be thereof duly convicted in any court of oyer and terminer hereafter to be erected according to law, shall be adjudged guilty of high treason, and forfeit his lands, tenements, goods, and chattels to the State, and be imprisoned any term not exceeding the duration of the present war with Great Britain, at the discretion of the judge or judges."

So, also, the same rule applied in the State of New York. On the 3d day of December, 1776, it was ordered that a committee be appointed to "devise an ordinance for securing all estates and effects which are deserted by the owners, or which, though under the care of others, belong to the enemy, or who have absconded."

After much investigation upon the part of the "committee of safety," and full reports of property, its condition, and the status of owners, it was finally agreed on the 22d of October, 1779, by an act entitled "An act for the forfeiture and sale of the estates of persons who have adhered to the enemies of this State, and for declaring the sovereignty of the people of this State in respect to all property within the same."

It may be interesting to refer to a paragraph or two of this statute. The preamble recites:

"And whereas the public justice and safety of this State absolutely require that the most notorious offenders shall be immediately hereby convicted and attainted of the offense aforesaid, [to wit, treason, adhering to the enemy,] in order to work a forfeiture of their respective estates and vest the same in the people of this State."

The first section of the law provided that certain men, naming them—

"Be, and each of them are hereby, severally declared to be, ipso facto, convicted and attainted of the offense aforesaid; and that all and singular the estate, both real and personal, held or claimed by them the said persons severally and respectively, whether in possession, reversion, or remainder within this State on the day of the passing of this act, shall be, and hereby is, declared to be forfeited and vested in the people of this State."

Again:

"That all forfeitures and confiscations of the lands, tenements, hereditaments, and real estate which heretofore have been by virtue of any former law or laws of this State against any person or persons whomsoever, or conviction for adhering to the late enemies of this State, or of this and the other United States of America, is, and are hereby, to all intents, constructions, and purposes in the law whatsoever, fully and absolutely ratified and confirmed, notwithstanding any error or errors in the proceedings thereon, or in anywise relating thereto, and all writs of error and errors on any judgment hereto rendered relating thereto are hereby forever barred."

I have made these quotations, and dwelt thus long, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of confiscation, to show the example of our fathers, and prove the right invested in us to confiscate the property, real and personal, of the enemies of our Government, and appropriate it to the people of the United States. But, sir, in the exercise of this great power the greatest discretion, the greatest caution, is to be observed. We must be sure of the person or persons upon whom we lay the strong arm of the Government. We must do no wrong, but deal out justice and right to every man.

Eleven of the States of the Union undertook to sever their connection with the United States and form a separate and independent government. They waged war to accomplish that end; they became enemies to those who remained true to the Constitution. There was no foundation in fact, none in law or justice, for this diabolical act of theirs; nevertheless they did it and having done it, those who conceived the idea, laid the plans, inaugurated the measures, and waged the war, are and must be held responsible; they must be made, as I have already said, to feel the terror of the law; they must be punished for treason, in body, confiscation of property, and exile from the land that gave them birth. But, Mr. Speaker, think you there are no loyal people in those eleven States? Think you there are not those there who love that flag now waving over your chair; who do not love that old Constitution written by our fathers; who do not believe this is their country, their beloved country, the country of Washington, of Jefferson, and of Jackson, of Scott and of Taylor, of Clay and of Webster, of themselves and their children? No, Mr. Speaker, they are there, noble, grand, enduring patriots.

It was my good fortune to have witnessed a scene which can never be effaced from memory.

When in the Army, in 1862, and in the northern part of Alabama, I happened one day to be passing through an humble yet respectable portion of the neighborhood, where I was camped, and observed moving along the muddy road a procession of silent, mourning people, preceded by an uncovered wagon, drawn by two horses, in which was borne the body of a noble Union soldier, killed in battle. I followed on to witness the scenes that might follow in that far-down country of rebellion. We drew up at a church house built of logs and covered with long, rough boards. The corpse was taken in and placed beneath the pulpit, the audience became seated, and an old, trembling, gray-haired father of the church ascended the pulpit, and in clear but feeble voice began the worship of that hour—

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

Then opening that Book of books he read that injunction of Scripture to all men to be subject unto the higher power and those in authority. His sermon was original, eloquent, and patriotic, full of love, truth, Christianity, and consolation. He closed with prayer for the President of the United States, the Army, the Navy, and the union of the country. Then, sir, there arose from near my side an old lady, tottering on her cane, being over threescore years and ten; approaching the uncovered coffin she bowed over the dead body and kissed its lifeless lips, pressing them warmly and long, as though she would impart life to them again that they might say "God bless you, mother;" but they spoke not, nor did they move; they were sealed in death. She took from beneath her cloak the flag of her country, the banner under which her noble son had fallen, and laying it over and around him she said, "Often, my child, have I covered you to shield you from cold, from suffering, and pain; but now for the last time I wrap you in the flag of your country, stained with your blood, and commend your soul and body to the God who gave it, and who now has taken it away. 'Blessed be the name of the Lord.'"

Mr. Speaker, think you there was no Unionism, no patriotism there, no philanthropy there? Nay, tell me not so. It is there, it is all over this broad land, in every State, in every county, in every neighborhood. Patriotism is not bound by county, or State, or party lines; but among all men, however much many have been misguided, there wells up in the bosoms of thousands and tens of thousands the deepest love of country, and their hearts' desire and prayer to God is for deliverance from oppression, wrong, and rebellion.

Mr. Speaker, can we turn a deaf ear to the claims, rights, privileges, and prayers of the long-suffering, much-enduring Union people of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee? Do not the deprivations, sufferings, and wrongs imposed upon these gallant, liberty-loving people, come up before us in eloquent and convincing terms, demanding attention, protection, and their proper place in the Union, now that they have with nobleness and tried patriotism reasserted their rights under the Constitution, thrown off the rebellion, and of their own accord enacted new laws, conforming to the rule prescribed by the Constitution of the United States requiring republican forms of government for each and every State? These people, whatever may have been their former prejudices, feelings, or interest, have by their own act thrown off slavery, made themselves free, and now ask to assume their relations with the Government as free States.

In regard to slavery, Mr. Speaker, I have probably said enough heretofore. I have declared here, as well as at home, and other parts of the country, that I was for its utter abolition. I believed conscientiously it was best for the country; I believed its abolition would produce among the white people, the owners and controllers of the Government, that homogeneity which had been forbidden by the very existence of slavery. When, therefore, the constitutional amendment was before the House I spoke and voted for it, and will continue to work with all the power and ability I may possess for its adoption by the people.

Sir, getting rid of slavery as it has heretofore existed in the United States, looking to the interest, prosperity, and advancement of our country, is one of those stupendous and rapid strides in the line of civilization, humanity, and Christianity, which, in its execution on this continent, is astounding in its character, and produces the greatest wonderment in the minds of all mankind.

When, on the 4th day of July, 1776, a few brave-hearted men, noble and wise patriots, in the city of Philadelphia, announced the Declaration of American Independence, it was a glorious day, a great work, a grand work, and all civilization wondered at the magnitude of the scheme, and trembled for fear of failure in so sublime an undertaking.

Mr. Speaker, the 4th of July, 1776, became the birthday of American independence, and will always be held dear in the memory of every American; but, sir, there is another day, which stands now, and will forever stand, alongside of the 4th of July. The 31st day of January, 1865, was the birthday of American liberty. The world was no less astonished at the action of those men on the 4th of July, 1776, than it will be at the action of this body on the 31st of January, 1865. Congress, by a two-thirds vote, after full and free discussion on this floor, after full discussion throughout the country, in all the States, in every county, of this question, and the endorsement by the people of a resolution adopted at Baltimore on the 7th of June, 1864, for the prohibition of slavery throughout the entire domain of the United States, adopted this resolution. It seems to me, then, that this question is almost at rest, that there is but little more in it to talk about. The war, or rather the rebellion, opened the door to this rapid and radical action on this subject, and the continuance of the war, the utter disregard by the South to the propositions of the President, published from time to time, has at last rendered the rights of property in man a foregone conclusion, a thing of the past, a thing never again to be allowed in this land. What man can regret this? Where is the patriot in all the land who to-day would revoke the vote of Congress, but lately given, which, by the concurrence of the people, will break the shackles, cut off the chains, and make four million human beings in this proud Republic free—free forever, and all their posterity; that vote which gave the greatest right any man can enjoy in any form of government, the right of man to himself, to call his wife his own, his children his own, his little property his own, and be amenable alone to the laws of the country of which he is a subject?

Mr. Speaker, while I am for the abolition of slavery, while I am for the utter extinction of that institution, and believe that all men should be free, whether white, black, red, or mixed, I cannot agree, nor will I consent by any speech or vote of mine, that there is no distinction in races.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] goes far beyond what I would say or admit. He may possess more of human kindness, more of Christianity, more of humanity, than I do, if you may believe so much of him from his speech on the subject of equality; but, sir, I submit, he does not entertain more justice, more patriotism, or philanthropy than I or thousands who live further South than he. His whole soul, heart, and mind run out toward the black race, and in his great sympathy and interest for them he seems to forget all other men. There is the poor white man, the poor red man, the various classes of men who compose society and government, entirely forgotten by him, ignored, left out of the count of wrongs and injuries imposed by the Constitution, laws, and Government of the United States, if such wrongs and injuries exist at all. A great deal has been done for the black man; more than he had a right to hope for in so short a time. Over two million have already been freed, and it will not be long, we trust, ere the military power of the rebellion is utterly broken, and all of the blacks set at liberty. We have made soldiers of them, and they have fought well. The Government had a right to do that, and it was but just and fair the black man should fight for his freedom. He could not procure it without sacrifice and bloodshed. In fact, Mr. Speaker, his freedom was all he asked; he desired nothing else. He felt and knew that he was not of the same kind, the same class of the white man; they were not nor could they ever become equals, associates, companions; there could never exist the same relations between them as did or might and would continue to exist between the different classes of white men.

One of the surest elements of social relations, that which brings men in closest contact, and superinduces freedom of thought, of speech, and confidence, is the elective franchise. The possession of property, the interchange of property, will not, does not, nor can it ever, produce this result. The latter is merely a business transaction, where dollars and cents are counted and passed between them; there the matter ends. In the former, under our system of government, the relation never changes. All offices, with but few exceptions, are filled by popular vote; the people mingle, and commingle, before and after the election. The candidates must see the people, must mix with them, must talk with them, eat, drink, and laugh with them. This intercourse brings necessarily the younger ones, the children, male and female, in contact; the representative and the constituent must be familiar and confidential with one another. The judge and juror must feel the dignity of their places, and appreciate the majesty of the law, and feel that they are equals in every respect, and can sit at the same table, and that their children can play together, and after a while with propriety marry and intermarry.

This is true of all men who are white; the Irishman, the German, the Frenchman, the Pole, and all others. There is no law, human or divine, which forbids it; no repugnance to the feelings in such intermixture; but with the black man it was not intended. God has made him different; his nose, his mouth, his eyes, his hair, his skin, indeed his whole conformation, is so utterly opposed to the white that not only the white man, but the black man himself feels and knows that he was never intended for any of these social or political rights. If he has a right to vote for the law-maker, the judge, the President, he has a right to become President, judge, law-maker. In voting for these various offices, and filling them, brings about, of course, that very state of social equality and intermixing which I have before referred to, and which I must believe is wrong, and cannot be consented to by the American people.

But, says one, you make soldiers of them, and should not a man who fights vote? Why do you put the livery of the Union on his back, musket in his hand, and send him to the field of battle, expose him to death, wounds, and torture, and yet deny him the great privilege of voting? I answer, sir, we send him out to assist in making his race free, to help them out of slavery and bondage, that they may be masters of their time, their labor, and themselves. When this shall have been done men should be satisfied; the black man will.

It has always been the law, and will always be the case in a Christian and civilized country like ours, that all men are protected in their property and goods. If it is thought laws at present are not stringent enough, that there is not sufficient security to the black man in his person, his life, his liberty, and his property, let us enact such as will afford it. I assume Congress has no right to determine who shall be voters in any one of the States; that is a right exclusively belonging to each individual State. Pennsylvania may let every sort of color vote; she has determined that question, and her constitution declares that negroes but white men shall be entitled to suffrage. Kentucky may amend her constitution, and allow all colors to vote if she chooses, and Pennsylvania nor any other State has a right to say a word. Congress has no power, no right, and it would be wrong to assume any such authority. This question must be left alone to the States.

When Arkansas and these other rebellious States have, by the assistance of the Government, thrown off the rebellion, repealed all their treasonable and obnoxious laws, they may amend their fundamental law to suit themselves, they may or may not allow the black man to vote. If they do not desire it, we should not require them to do it. Above all, sir, would it be evidently unwise and wrong for us to legislate on this subject when the Union people of those States are not represented here, when the men they have sent here to watch their interest and speak for them are not allowed to take their seats, nor to open their mouths upon any subject.

Party, party interest, party aggrandizement, not patriotism, is the ruling passion of some, I fear of too many. Our country is not bounded by the border slave States; the Atlantic, the Pacific, the Gulf of Mexico, are alone our boundary lines. Our flag has and it must again wave over all this territory in triumph and peace.

I beseech gentlemen to rise higher than party; possess, encourage, and practice enlarged and patriotic views. And here let me borrow a short paragraph and read it to the House, which expresses in more beautiful and eloquent language my own feelings than I am able to employ:

"The love of that which we call country is among the highest and noblest passions of the soul. The love that kindles into joyful enthusiasm at the sight of the national symbol, that feels, personally, every insult offered to its object, that burns brightest in absence, that is full of chivalry and bravery and self-devotion, that sacrifices itself on battle-fields, and counts such sacrifice a joy, a glory, that lives even after country is lost, and passes down through many generations as a precious inheritance; this, if not religion, in one of its forms of manifestation, is certainly its next of kin. Indeed, there is something of every love, and of all love, in patriotism. Country is the patriot's mistress, his father and his mother, his brother and his sister, his home, his teacher, his friend, his treasure; the storehouse into which he gathers all his affections, heavenly and human—all his interest, aspirations, hopes; and when necessity demands it, he turns his face and feet from mistress, father, mother, brother, sister, home, friend, and treasure, and gives himself to his country in obedience to motives that are hardly to be distinguished from the highest religious feelings and convictions which his bosom holds. I think it would be hard to tell where, in the sublimer walks of the soul, patriotism leaves off and religion begins. In many of its humble manifestations patriotism doubtless halts this side of heaven; but when it becomes sacrificial, its incense curls around the pillars of the eternal throne."

It is to such patriotic feelings as this, it is to those who possess such high and noble sentiments that this country is to look for safety, salvation, and perpetuity. The politician, the mere partisan, he who works for self-advancement, who looks at his country from such a stand-point, is not a safe man, cannot be trusted in times like these. In all these States South are thousands of such patriots as just referred to by me; they are our friends, the friends of this glorious Government. The patriotic mother of the North has given her noble son to the Union, and with his musket he has met and marched in the same ranks, fought in the same battle, and died on the same field with the sons of southern mothers who were as devotedly attached to the Union as the mother of the North. We cannot, we will not surrender that land, that glorious, that gallant people. All that soil has been made sacred, all those true people have endeared themselves to every patriot.

"Is there a spot on earth more dear
To him who loves o'er worth to weep,
A grave more worthy of a tear,
Than where the soldier's ashes sleep?"

"What though no marble decks his tomb,
And lone and lowly be his bed,
Yet there the sweetest flowers shall bloom,
There spring her greenest mantle spread."

"Forever hallowed be the spot
Where he doth rest in calm repose,
By friends and country ne'er forgot,
Revered and honored e'en by foes."

"Oft from the sod that decks his grave
Shall lingering beauty dash the dew,
Oft chant a requiem to the brave,
And garlands o'er the green turf strew."

Mr. Speaker, we loved our country before this war began; at least I hope there are but few exceptions; but, sir, all patriots feel that it is dearer to them now than it ever was before. The country, the American Government, the United States, its freedom, its independence, the perfect security of its citizens in "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," is their thought by night, by day, and their constant prayer. Shall not we who have the power, and can bring about this glorious result, do our utmost, renew our energies, increase our means, and pluck from the grasp of tyranny, despotism, and treason, the people who have held out their hands to us, given us their aid, their comfort, and sympathy? What is called patriotism in many places, by many persons, is a cheap commodity. There has been no war among them, no oppression, no robbery, no crime, no arson, no murder. Men, women, and children, because they have loved the Constitution and Government have not been deprived of home, of liberty, of property, and life, in many of the localities of gentlemen on this floor. But, sir, go with me to these States further South—no tongue can express it; no mind can conceive of it; no heart scarcely could bear it; naked, hungry, thirsty, have they been driven from home; the men conscripted, the husband, father, and brother forced at the point of the bayonet and hunted down by bloodhounds, tied and compelled to bear arms against their flag, their homes and families. Many have made refuge within our lines. They, too, come weary, worn, naked, and heart-broken. They desire once more, and that soon, to return to their old homes, the place of their birth. Whatever of desolation there is there, however much the beauty of the country has been effaced, they love that old home still; their feelings and affections linger around it. They want to be there, with that home in the Union, that flag, the emblem of their liberty over them, the Constitution their first and guiding law. Let us help them; let us be lenient toward them, kind, affectionate; remember it might have been otherwise, and then how happy the rule would apply, "Do unto others as you would others should do unto you."

This war might have been conducted on northern ground. Many hard battles have been fought in northern States; many more may yet be fought on similar soil—some further North. The war is not yet over; there is a large army in the field against the Union. They are a brave and desperate people, and will not surrender, in my judgment, until the armies are whipped, scattered, and utterly demoralized. Let us then make friends in all these States. Give protection, comfort, and encouragement to all Union people by our legislation, speeches, votes, and action. Make them feel they are again in the Union, or rather that they are redeemed from rebellion. Make friends of our quasi enemies; weaken the enemy, the rebellion, the confederacy, every way we can, and strengthen ourselves.

Will the adoption of the measures in this bill incite kind and warm feelings toward the Government, or will they not rather dishearten, discourage, and weaken them? Your armies have been for three years in occupancy of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee. The two former States have reorganized their governments; they have elected Governors, judges, members of the Legislature, and sent Representatives to Congress. What is wrong in the matter? Wherein do their laws, constitutional or statutory, differ from that principle of justice and right making each one conform to a "republican form of government?" In no respect whatever. Pass this bill, and the elections will be conducted hereafter just as they have been heretofore. The same people will vote, probably the same men be returned to Congress. Now, then, what have we gained? What more security for the loyalty and good conduct of these people than we have now? I admit I can see none. Now is the time to act; now is the time to meet these people; now is the time to exhibit to them what we have so often promised and must eventually do.

They have been told the northern men were their friends, would stand by them in the reorganization of their State governments. In good faith have they gone on to do this thing. They come here with constitution, statutes, in the hands of Union men, true men, those who have never bowed the knee to Baal; they knock at your door after your invitation; they stand, cold, shivering, hungry, naked, bleeding, and you keep the door closed, turn a deaf ear to their appeals, and they must turn away sorrowful. Where are they to go, to whom are they to look for succor and aid in this hour of need? Sir, this Congress is doing a great wrong, a wrong to itself, to the country, and especially this down-trodden, persecuted, and suffering people. God will not bless a people unless they are just and practice those high and noble principles of eternal justice and Christianity which were given us by the Saviour of the world. If the hungry come to you, feed them; the thirsty, give them drink; the naked, clothe them; the suffering and oppressed, relieve them.

Give up this narrow, contracted patriotism and philanthropy; let your souls go out to a noble people who amid all the conflicts of war, bloody war, devastating war, have proven themselves your friends, the unchangeable friends of the country. Let these States come back now, let their Representatives take seats, and discuss with us the great principles involved in this controversy, the reconstruction of the Union; they are our brothers, brothers in kind, brothers in blood, brothers in feeling and sympathy, in patriotism and philanthropy, in Union and in war. Let them come in. Sir, I care not what others may do; as for me, I will reach out my hand to them, grasp it warmly, heartily, fervently, and say, "Welcome brother; you have come up through fire and blood and war, but your escutcheon is clear and bright, your record untarnished; you are of us and with us; I welcome you here." Do this, sir, and you gladden the hearts of thousands of people all through the South; they will turn their eyes toward you, their hearts toward you, and by their virtues, their will, their love of country and that flag, will form a society, a community, a government, a power in the South which no other on earth can overturn.

What a glorious day would that be! How happy would be the American heart, how astonished would be the world! England's neutrality would be converted into friendship and sympathy; France would hesitate at her movements on this continent; our friends in Europe would rejoice and take strength, and the rebellion dwindle away like dew before the morning sun, and peace, glorious peace, be restored to this distracted country.

Gentlemen say all the territory of these States is not within our jurisdiction, that it requires an army there to hold it. Admit it. There is a large army in and around this city; it is here to hold it. There is a large army in Maryland; it is there to hold it. There is one in Kentucky, one in Missouri, one in West Virginia; they are there to hold them. Hold them against whom? Against the threatening armies of the rebellion, the men who would march all over the land and destroy it as they went. Are you to prevent the organization of society, of government, because armies are there? Why, sir, they were sent there to do this thing, to restore that which had been destroyed, to give the people the right to resume their position in society and government, and open up that commercial and manufacturing interest which alone gives a nation power and strength and places her among the first.

War is sustained alone by commerce and manufactures; it is a question of capital. We know now that its prolongation depends upon capital; without capital it must cease; and capital is produced only by commerce and manufactures. Hence the North is being successful; it is a large manufacturing and commercial country; its capital therefore is limitless. We can prosecute the war for fifty years; the South is not so; it has been alone a producing country; it depended upon the North for seamen, for ships, for machinery, for manufactures; and when they were cut off, their cotton laid in piles or rotted in the field or pen. They had to depend upon foreign Powers for all we before had furnished them; they had to go abroad and borrow capital; they have no manufactures now, they have no machinery, they have no commerce; hence they must suffer, linger, and lingering die.

Now, then, what ought we to do? Take in all these States as they ask to come with republican forms of government; let our people intermix, establish manufactures among them, open their rivers and ports to commercial trade, take out their cotton, rice, sugar, corn, hay, fabrics of every description, and you produce capital, you gain strength at home and demand respect and attention abroad.

The President of the United States tells us that the population of the United States, save those in rebellion, is greater than it was when the war began, notwithstanding we have sent two million men to the field. Those people are in the North; the South has become more or less depopulated. The North is crowded, the South sparse. Lands in the North are dear, in the South cheap; in the North comparatively scarce, in the South abundant. Then open the door wide, invite all to go, put your boats on rivers, your ships on the sea, cars to running, and England and France, all Europe, instead of feeling jealous of us and working for our destruction, will open the doors for their superabundance of laboring men, and millions of people will, in a very short time, fill the land. Our own northern brethren will emigrate South, new relations will be cultivated between the northern man and the southerner.

New Orleans had scarcely been possessed by the Union Army than hundreds and thousands from the North rushed there for business. So with Vicksburg, Memphis, Nashville, Savannah, and now from every section men who dared not heretofore go South are asking to establish business in Charleston, South Carolina. Wilmington is open for trade; let it be so. Cultivate those who would be good and loyal; let them and us become friends; open trade, and let them see that the United States is the Government to do this thing, protect and foster them. Do this; invite Union people to all points, and Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, and Wilmington are forever ours. They cannot get them back. England and France must come to these points South for trade, and they will come, and when these loyal people and others, too, see these ports filled with foreign vessels, they will rush with whatever they have, and open a commerce heretofore unknown to America.

But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot indulge further. I have but a word to say and I have done. Do we not all consider that these States are ours, these people belong to us? Yes, we certainly feel so. Then let us legislate in a proper spirit, not be too harsh, and great good, in my humble judgment, will come of it. I know these people better than most of you. I have been among them ever since the war; I have seen them and talked with them. Last summer I was in Tennessee, Arkansas, and Louisiana. I know I reflect to-day their opinions, their feelings; and I am proud to stand here and speak for them; I am proud to be able to say that they desire that the North and the South shall be one country and one people, and that they are laboring for that end. The time is coming when it will be so; when all of us can be free and equal in every State; when the gentleman from Pennsylvania can go South, and the native of Charleston can go North; when that time comes—

"The northern pioneer shall go joyful on his way
To wed Penobscot's waters with San Francisco's bay;
To make the rugged places smooth and sow the vales
With grain,
And bear, with liberty and law, the Bible in his train.
The mighty West shall bless the East, and sea shall answer sea,
And mountain unto mountain call, 'PRAISE GOD, FOR WE ARE FREE!'"

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY GRIDER, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 21, 1865,

On the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

MR. GRIDER. I shall trouble the House but a short time. When this rebellion broke out, the declaration of the American people not in rebellion was in favor of "the Constitution as it is," no change or amendment. And in favor of "the Union as it was." We declared, we stand by our flag and our rights and in the Union, and defend them there. The whole object of the Government at the beginning of this rebellion pointed to this end, not to revolution nor amendments, and the people concurred in this view. None contemplated changing the condition and relations of the people to each other, or their government in the States, whether free or slave, either by legislation, by proclamations, or military power, nor by an amendment to the Constitution. This the record fully illustrates. In January, 1861, the House passed a resolution stating that "neither the Federal Government nor the people, nor government of slaveholding States, have a purpose or constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any of the States of the Union." This same sentiment is differently and strongly expressed in the Chicago platform that nominated Mr. Lincoln:

"That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to the balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our fabric depend."

If these resolutions were right then, are they not right now? Each State to order and control its own domestic institutions, in its own way, by its laws, under its own constitution, granting to every other State the same privilege; this is essential to the balance of power on which hangs the perfection and endurance of our fabric. This is the hinge on which our Federal Government turns. By law we cannot interfere with these domestic institutions. If the perfection and endurance of our Federal Government depend upon the freedom of the States in the exercise of this acknowledged right, I ask, have you the power so to amend the Constitution of the Federal Government as to interfere with the States. The States had these rights before the Federal Government was formed or adopted; they never surrendered these rights, but, on the contrary, retained them in the formation of the General Government; and without such retention the General Government never would have been formed. The right to hold slaves never was derived from the Federal Government; but when the Federal Government was formed its Constitution warranted the right to hold slaves to the States.

But if the power exists to pass this constitutional amendment, is it expedient? We have glanced upon this subject at the spirit and purport of the Federal Constitution as to slavery. The resolutions we have quoted are but brief statements of the spirit and principles of the Constitution, looked to by the people pending this fearful crisis, when every loyal State and every individual interest should not be put in danger, but, on the contrary, guarded with the more vigilance as the danger may have increased.

Sir, while it is the duty of the Government to "enforce the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion," it is equally the duty of the Government not to assume authority belonging to others, nor disregard the rights of individual claims, privileges, and property long since vested in them and warranted to them by all the sanctions of law and the Constitution, both State and Federal. In this age, constitutions and fundamental laws have been looked to as of high consideration, and the wisest and most discreet are summoned to the task of calm and mature deliberation in their formation and adoption when any change is supposed to be necessary; but it never could be regarded wise and prudent to abandon or alter constitutions in the midst of a passionate, afflicting, and furious rebellion, a rebellion that calls for all the power, coolness, and determination of our Government to avert the fearful efforts that so persistently threaten the dismemberment and ruin of our Government.

I ask, sir, in all soberness, in the name of common sense, if this hour of suffering excitement, malicious feeling, and partisan bitterness is the time for deliberation and kindly, hopeful, safe conference upon constitutional amendments. I voted against the amendment last session and heard no complaint from my constituents, and see no reason to change my action, in view of the duty I owe to myself, my State, and my whole country. The amendment to the Constitution, if adopted, will certainly be subversive of every power and principle supposed by the people to belong exclusively to the people of each State for themselves. I apprehend it was so regarded by the framers of the Constitution; and all but one of the States, when it was framed, were slave States. The States of the Federal Government have all alike acquiesced in this view, this principle, and no action has ever been taken, except by the States, at their own suggestion, to become divested of slavery. And although there has been much useless and foolish anxiety and agitation for years upon the subject, such a scheme, such action as is now proposed, never was conceived until the fury of party zeal devised this action, while many loyal men, women, and children involved in the question are unrepresented. Is it not best to act with caution and not hurry rashly and boldly to do what may be done without authority and what may not be best, what can be done hereafter by those peculiarly involved in the interest, if so decided, and that becomes necessary. Washington said we ought to resist with care the spirit of innovation upon the principles of the Constitution, however specious the pretext; known and acknowledged rights, legal and constitutional, long acquiesced in, ought not to be disregarded, cannot be disregarded.

If every other influence was in favor of this amendment, there is one overwhelming reason against it. Slave property is held by the State constitution, by municipal law, usage, acquiescence, and the warrants of the Federal Government. It is therefore as much a vested right as your title to lands, to capital, stocks, and shipping; you hold all alike under the usage, the law, and Constitution.

I deny, therefore, that the Government can by legislation or constitutional amendments deprive the owners of the services, emancipate slaves of Kentucky, without first making compensation therefor, any more than the Government can take your land, capital, stocks, and shipping. The Government must pay the citizen for whatever property is taken from the citizen, not at a depreciated price and deterioration of the property, especially if produced by the action, not of the rebellion mainly, but by our Government, the impolicy and unconstitutionality of our laws, the useless and hurtful collision brought upon slavery. There must be "adequate compensation" first made before emancipation, no matter how or by whom it is done. This is not proposed. This has not been done. This is not intended. How much pay have you got for the slaves wrongfully enlisted in Kentucky? Where is your commissioner to value them, promised by law in July last? None yet appointed. This constitutional amendment is but the consummation of a series of partisan acts which have been passed, brought to bear designedly, not from necessity, against the constitutional rights of a loyal State, and means exactly what Mr. Webster meant when he said:

"I have often expressed that over slavery, as it exists, this Government has no control whatever; it is entirely and exclusively a State concern."

And while it is thus clear that Congress has no direct power over the subject, it is our duty to take care that the authority of this Government is not brought to bear upon it by any indirect interference whatever. Now if this indirect interference with which I charge the Federal Government has depreciated the property so that it is worth now some forty million; in 1863 some fifty or sixty million; in 1860 some hundred and eight million, then the General Government is bound to pay for the slaves, giving an adequate price, if she forces the emancipation, without the consent of Kentucky, or even with her consent, for the State cannot compromise the vested constitutional rights of the citizen. Can it be done without compensation? Certainly not; neither law nor constitutional amendments can take from the citizen vested rights without compensation. It is as legal, moral, and in as good faith to do it one way as the other. Take private property without compensation? No civilized or Christian nation ever did it. The history of England, I believe, shows when she by law emancipated she paid the owners for their slaves; but she had no State or Federal Constitutions to direct her, merely a sense of honor and moral justice. And to be constitutional, moral, just, and honest, so must our Government pay if they emancipate.

If our Government must pay for the slaves emancipated—and this I think none can deny—where is the authority to raise the money, the authority to tax the free States and those not holding slaves to pay for this emancipation? How can you raise this money from the whole people, or take it from the Treasury? There is no such authority found in the Federal Constitution. I know you have done it in this District, and supported contrabands and paupers, but this proves nothing but partisan boldness and recklessness. Where is the grant, the power given? The powers not granted to the United States are reserved to the States respectively and the people. Upon the subject of slavery, to the Federal Government there is no power given it to manage, continue it, or discontinue it. All it has to do, by the Constitution, is to warrant it to the States, where the exclusive power exists to hold or free the slaves if compensation be made. There is no power, nor any power that can be incidentally inferred, warranting this constitutional legislation in the name of amendment, overriding the acknowledged rights of the citizen and the State.

Then, if you cannot carry out the amendment without compensation, and have no power to raise the money, it follows the constitutional amendment ought not to be adopted, and in this view you are at once remitted back to the long-cherished and admitted principles of the Government that entered into the very elements of its formation. That the Federal Government has nothing to do with slavery but to warrant it to the States, and the States in their own time, and in their own wisdom, and in their own mode, if they choose to divest themselves of slavery, may do it as it always has been done by States, certainly, however, always providing for their well-being in kindness and humanity.

I see in a published speech of a distinguished friend and gentleman of the Kentucky Legislature a mistaken view of the record in regard to compensated emancipation for Kentucky. He says:

"But in the summer of 1862, fearing that the policy of the nation in regard to the slaves of the insurgents might have to be changed by reason of the persistency of treason upon this issue, and knowing that in the ruin of the system in the seceded States would be involved its destruction in the loyal States, the President proposed to us a scheme of compensated emancipation. This would have secured to us, to Kentucky, $65,000,000 for our slaves."

The gentleman is wholly mistaken. Emancipation was proposed to most of the border-State men. They disavowed any authority over it in Congress, stated the State and State authorities were the competent and only authority by which emancipation could be initiated, but further said they could not propose it to the people, even if it was proper, without some certainty as to indemnity and compensation. Mr. Lincoln admitted the force of the suggestion, and said he could not insist otherwise, and remarked that if Congress would not make the appropriation "that knocked the bottom out of the tub," and he had "not another word to say;" and in view of this very question of compensation for emancipated slaves the border-State men said, referring it to the people of their States:

"Before they ought to consider the proposition it should be presented in such a tangible, practical, efficient shape as to command their confidence, that its fruits are contingent only upon their acceptance. We cannot trust anything to the contingency of future legislation. If Congress, by proper and necessary legislation, shall provide sufficient funds and place them at your disposal, to be applied by you to the payment of any of our States or the citizens thereof who shall adopt the abolishment of slavery, either gradual or immediate as they may determine, and the expense of deportation and colonization of the liberated slaves, then will our States and people take this proposition into careful consideration for such decision as in their judgment is demanded by their interests, their honor, and their duty to the whole country."

This paper was signed by some twenty border-State men, all from Kentucky but one or two. So far, this is the true history; and it is a great mistake that at any time Kentucky was ever in a position to get $65,000,000, or any other sum, for compensated emancipation. But it is true the President did send a message asking a fund for this purpose. Mr. White, of Indiana, I believe, under said message, reported a bill for the purpose, which was not acted upon, and finally reported back to the House and indefinitely postponed, and thereby, for reporting said bill, lost his nomination to next Congress. This is the end, so far as I know, of Kentucky compensated emancipation. I ask pardon for this digression.

You observe, however, among other things in this border-State extract, deportation and colonization are prominently set forth. This would avoid that terrible impoverishment and demoralization spoken of in Governor Dennison's message, of Ohio, now Postmaster General. Immediate emancipation of some three million negroes, (for some one million have already perished by the improper interference with slavery,) without colonization, is ruin for the time to both races, and final extermination to blacks.

"An act of immediate general emancipation, throwing four million colored caste loose on society, North and South, would leave them more enslaved than they are now. Without the intelligence, power, and means of a master of the superior race to support them in the competition of that race in the business of life they would perish. The North rejecting them, as it has done in many States, and might do in others, the four million let loose in the South would encounter a war of castes—a war of extermination."

I am not willing to risk these great additional evils by going for the constitutional amendment, never necessary, and the very pretext for it brought on by every possible mode of indirect interference on the part of the General Government and its unrestrained agencies. If slavery had been let alone, and the Government and its agencies had, according to the Crittenden resolution, announced in substance there was to be no interference with slavery, we would have avoided this whole controversy and its evils, directed our whole attention to the rebellion, and accomplished the great end of a full, peaceful, complete integrity of the Union upon the unamended basis of the Constitution! The slaves would mostly have staid at home, if the master had been permitted to exercise a humane, reasonable, ordinary influence with his servants; if they had not been seduced and protected, by agencies too well known, from the control of the master, under the power of the unconstitutional additional Article of War, which was passed on purpose and to this very end, to disturb and demoralize the institution! So soon and ever since the Government quit the pure, true principles of the Crittenden resolutions, which every man sanctioned solemnly by his vote upon oath, making a clear, full exposition of the spirit and philosophy, limitations, and power of the Constitution, and ordered in all wisdom how this rebellion ought to be managed, to end and purpose. It countenanced no emancipation; that certainly ought to be left for consideration when the rebellion is over—ought to be suggested by the people in their proper capacity, and not by partisan politicians. Nor did it suggest any equality and blending of races in all the walks, rights, and privileges of the American citizen.

But now, to give plausibility to this constitutional amendment, and keep up with party and leaders of the party, you must insist upon equal rights and privileges to the freedmen at the ballot-box, full eligibility to office—no half-way freedom, but the investment of full, complete immunities and rights under the Constitution, as all other citizens, without any abatements or distinction. Yes, sir, more; they are to have the full protection of the General Government, shielded and governed by all the power of the Army and Navy. You are to have standing armies to enforce and accomplish these ends; for the House, by law, has created a new agency in the War Department—"the Freedmen's Bureau"—which, by its officers and agencies, fed and paid by the General Government out of taxes wrung from the people, must protect, govern, and direct the freedmen, install them upon confiscated land, and work them on plantations, (deeper in servitude,) act as their next friend in all things, creating in fact what Wendell Phillips says will have to be done—a military despotism in the South for twenty years!

I repudiate this substitute for colonization, this tissue of folly, this series of measures that is making faint the patriotic heart, that is undermining our social system, the elementary principles of the Government, to be consummated by this constitutional amendment; a constitutional amendment which may be adopted by the present Legislatures who were never elected to that end, for the question never was submitted to the people, and if submitted in the last test of public sentiment lacked thousands upon thousands of the constitutional majority of the people necessary to adopt it.

This constitutional amendment rests upon doubtful authority, but this need not be so closely examined, as the impolicy of the measure is so palpably seen. The voice of all history is against it; experiments even in calm, peaceful times, have failed in all cases of immediate emancipation; no matter about the question of slavery, its philanthropy, &c.; "historical facts stare us in the face, that it is a misplaced philanthropy to endeavor to elevate the African to an equality with the Caucasian race. Either the inferior becomes more abject and miserable, or both, like mixing tar with water, deteriorate, and will finally go into irretrievable decline. A superior and inferior race cannot live together on terms of equality."

In relation to this constitutional amendment we hear cant phrases, the force and logic of which I confess do not strike me—"might as well give it up, slavery is dead," "slavery must be wiped out"—which of these two propositions or statements do gentlemen intend to rely upon? Certainly not the first. If your indirect interference, your proclamation, has killed slavery, and you are not willing to acknowledge all you have done heretofore was strategy, and wickedly and not patriotically intended to deteriorate slavery and make it odious and burdensome, what do you want with an amendment to the Constitution? In that view there is no use for it.

But, sir, having but one idea as a party, and that was to charge upon slavery and never mind the rebellion, follow your party and their orders. "Slavery must be wiped out," and nothing can do it but an amendment to the Constitution. You hear it—slavery is of no use, better get rid of it, it is a great burden. Who superinduced this conviction? Who uses this logic? The men that love law, the Constitution, and delight to see the vested rights of men regarded? No. I am not weeping over slavery; my constituents are not. It is to the suppression of the rebellion and the return of peace to which they turn all their prayers and anxieties. So ought the Government, exclusively. Suppose slavery is deteriorated in Kentucky, and has become burdensome, upon whom does the burden fall? Certainly not upon the free States, or those who make the complaint. The owner of the property makes none, not at all. He asks to be let alone in the enjoyment of his rights; but the vivid intelligence and bleeding sympathies of intermeddlers are very much agitated that a man who owns a few servants is so burdened and oppressed. What, then, shall be done? Free them, and cast them as contrabands on the public or the kindness of the former master? Why, sir, often these contrabands use more rations at particular times and places than the Army itself. Why will it be any better for the slave when emancipated? Will he eat and wear less of choice, and work more than now? Is he not best at home with his master, with all his bounties? At all events there is where the law and Constitution have placed him, and if gentlemen will take any advice personally they will not exhaust all their good feeling for the negroes, but remember the thousands of our own race that are suffering from ten thousand causes every where, and looking to the Government for comfort and relief. Give them at least a just share of your sympathies.

The negroes if emancipated are not to be sent to Liberia or anywhere else, but to stay where they are or wander off and return; by no means improving their condition or habits of industry and thrift; producing a constant unsettled, uneasy, cramped state of mind and feeling, with both white and black; leading to suspicion, unsafety, crimination, conflict, with a practical agitation that must result in evil and some manner of separation, not equality. This will be heightened by circumstances of returning emancipated soldiers of every class and assuming at least as much as they are entitled to. In my judgment, the condition of Kentucky in regard to slavery or negroes, now, as it is, is far better than it will be when all the now servants are perfectly unrestrained and free, and lead to consequences in this relation much more to be regretted than any we have yet seen. At all events so fearful am I of making things worse, I have been unwilling to favor this constitutional amendment for the sudden emancipation all at once of three or four million slaves. It will produce consequences ever to be regretted, and leave for our country, amid all the embarrassments already upon us, with our heavy unmanageable debt, for the next generation a conflict and entanglement with these freed people upon our hands; and after doing all that could be done in their behalf, and trying gentle and kind means, be constrained by force to protect ourselves, to separate them from us and our soil, and, as in all other countries, regret upon every account the sudden action upon such a large scale upon so delicate a subject.

"To suddenly transport four million bondsmen from a long, immemorial servitude, under the besetting improvidence, want of care for themselves, ignorance, low vices and indolence, to a condition of freedom, with all the untutored responsibilities of providing against want, surrounded by the snares of temptation and vice, to which the negro character too freely yields; without whose checks of family police regulations that have for centuries restrained an inferior race, would inevitably propagate miseries untold for both classes that ages could not efface; and the great question is, as it ever has been, which is the greater evil, to suddenly force emancipation, or permit God, in his administration of human affairs, to solve a problem that many nations have for centuries been vainly endeavoring to determine by edicts, codes, and proclamations; and if it be asked 'why not try it as a retributive punishment on the cause of the war?' the answer has already been furnished by the tears and blood of nations that have been poisoned by quaffing from the same chalice.

"We shall be truly bold, if we venture this general emancipation field, under our peculiar condition, surrounded already with war and heavy taxation, inviting other troubles that must come thick, heavy, and fast if this general sudden emancipation is adopted and proclaimed."—McKenzie.

And the fanaticism of the thing is, if it must be done, there are so many more and appropriate times to do it, not now. I hope it may not be adopted, if ever, until we are through the rebellion, in peace, and it is submitted fully to the people, and then for State and not Federal action. I cling to it, that it is our local State interest, and the General Government ought not to interfere; and I think I have the full concurrence of the President in his message of March 6, 1862, in which he proposed compensated emancipation, having been first suggested by the border-State men, "such a proposition on the part of the General Government, sets up no claim or right by the Federal authority to interfere with slavery within State limits, referring, as it does, the absolute control of the subject in each case to the State and its people immediately interested."

Now, why must the State Legislature so ardently and speedily ratify this amendment? Would it not at least be respectful in so grave and momentous a matter to meet, and if convenient refer it to the people of the States? This is, as I said, the consummation and indorsement of a series of injurious acts already passed touching the question of slavery, and I felt it my duty to my constituents and my country to oppose them all, and to be consistent, and as I believe, reflect the wishes of my constituents. Where the power is doubtful and the policy clearly injurious I could not feel inclined or authorized to vary from my former action, and contravene what I regarded the will and interest of my district. The complication of this question, the persistency in regard to it, in making offers or terms of peace, is powerfully injurious. We proposed, when the rebellion was suppressed, the war ought to cease, and remit back each State to its position and rights, whether free or slave. Now this new element is inserted, the freedom of all slaves in rebel and loyal States. The rebels, claiming their independence, propositions known to be unacceptable were made, so that, with the exception of our success in arms, upon the mere question of negotiation for peace we are further apart than when we began. I regret this. Oh, how bitter is the anguish and suffering of our country! How ardently do our people, in sorrow and tears, pray for peace! There is but one condition on our part that should be offered, and I use the words of Mr. FINCK, of Ohio, to express the terms:

"Sir, if the Administration had borne high, in the face of Heaven and the American people, the broad banner of the Constitution, inscribed upon it, 'the Constitution and the Union, these must be preserved at all hazards, these are our terms of peace, we ask no other; this war, in my humble judgment, would long since have terminated.'"

You have my hasty and desultory remarks, and I am done.

LOAN BILL.

SPEECH OF HON. ELIJAH WARD, OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1865,

On the bill to provide ways and means for the support of the Government.

Mr. WARD. The securities thus far issued by the Government in the progress of the gigantic war now desolating portions of the country are held chiefly by corporations and our citizens, and those hereafter to be issued will in the main go into the same channels. The bankruptcy of the Government would produce the most serious disaster to the nation, bring ruin upon almost every business interest, and desolation and misery to a large portion of our citizens. Hence the people are vitally interested in maintaining the public credit and in a course of policy best adapted to secure that end. Difference of opinion should only exist as to the mode to obtain such a result.

The financial condition of the country, which it is the part of wisdom to examine, invites our most serious consideration.

The Comptroller of the Currency, in a circular addressed to the banks which are organized under the new national plan, tells us that "the apparent prosperity of the country will be proved to be unreal when the war is closed." He evidently intends that there shall be no deception of the people nor concealment of the real truths of our condition. This revelation emanates from an official high in the confidence of the Government, who tells the banks distinctly not to be deceived by the present seeming prosperous condition of the commercial interests of the country, not to fall into the error of regarding inflation as prosperity. Truly, words of wisdom. It is a bold confession of the Treasury Department that our prosperity is seeming, not actual, but I wish there was always as much boldness and frankness displayed in the management of public affairs as the Comptroller exhibits. Doubtless, if he were asked why he utters such a warning, he would reply that the laws which regulate currency are laws of God as much as the laws of gravitation, of magnetism, of light, heat, and electricity. They may be for a time interrupted. An iron ball may be temporarily suspended in the air by a post under it, or a string holding it, but the law operates, and time will show that the suspension is artificial, and whenever the artificial support fails, is removed, or decays, the ball will go down; and that time is sure to come sooner or later. So the laws of currency may be interrupted, and the appearance of things such as to promise permanence, but the end of the temporary interruption will come, and then we shall see that the promises were false. Let men be prepared for such events.

According to the most favorable statement, it is conceded that if the war were to end now the expenses incident to its close would swell the national debt to over two thousand millions. Add the State, county, city, and township debts, which are constantly accumulating, and it will be found that our indebtedness approximates the debt of Great Britain, if the difference in the wealth and rate of interest be considered. The annual interest of our debt is more than the expenses of the Government before the war. We do not yet fully realize our condition, because we are in the whirl of excitement and have only begun to feel the weight of taxation. I do not take this view of the subject to discourage. I think it right to state a fact about which there is no secret. Let each one inquire for himself how much debt in proportion to its wealth a nation can carry in safety.

Congress has no more important question to answer than how much revenue shall be raised, and from what source. The policy of the Secretary of the Treasury has hitherto been based upon a maximum of borrowing and a minimum of taxation. I suppose that during all the past, borrowing has gone on as rapidly as the credit of the Government would allow, that the Secretary of the Treasury has always been in the market, leaving no mass of accessible capital to go unassailed. The bond market gives evidence of being as redundant as the currency market, and the Government, which goes into the former with its securities depreciated, promising to pay interest upon them at par, may make an excellent show of advantage to the confiding lender; but the result of every effort to raise the amount borrowed to an equivalency to the amount desired would show a process of burning the financial candle at both ends—rather instructive than profitable.

The existing system is a failure. Those who are charged with originating the financial measures of Congress; however, seem to be still more wedded to the folly of an almost exclusive reliance on loans. The crude notion that banking capital is national wealth; that the multiplication of paper money is the increase of riches; that a well-ordered system of credit is dependent upon and necessarily must be blended with an inordinate, uncontrollable power to issue a fictitious circulating medium more subject to ebbs and floods than the ever-changing tides, all, all, have had their day. The fruits they have borne have disrobed them of the sophistries which deluded and the mysteries which passed for wisdom. Mankind has read the nature of their propensities in the public and private misfortunes which they have entailed upon the country and the people. Their true character has been seen in the spirit of recklessness and dishonesty which they have nurtured, and the mental vision of the political economist, the farmer, and the mechanic, is no longer obscured by these cunningly-devised schemes for deceiving the people. I have the satisfaction, sir, of having lived through the time of their recent origin, progress, and power, and I trust will live until their downfall; of having, in all their phases, met them as a determined foe, held them to be intrinsically incapable of good and dangerously mischievous. Talents that, well directed, might have been envied, have served with devotion in efforts to uphold them. But I hope these, and all false appeals to prejudice, to avarice, and to the baser passions, will prove unavailing to prevent the triumph of truth over error.

The unusual degree of liveliness which that sedate article of commodity, gold, has exhibited during the war is generally conceded not to be the effect of any additional degree of wholesome vigor which the metal in question has acquired, but is rather to be attributed to the distended and feverish condition, not of itself, but of the arteries of trade in which it circulates; in fact that it is not the gold which has proved changing in its relations to other things, but other things which have become locomotive, changing their relation to the gold.

The final cause of this phenomenon is doubtless chargeable to the extraordinary increase which has taken place in our paper currency. The first effect of such an increase is to create an advance in the price of every article of traffic or desire. The next is, through the failure of public confidence in the ultimate value of the circulating medium, that all values become unsettled. The market grows subject to panics. Prices rush upward and downward without any apparent reason. Speculation takes the place of trade, and men, conscious that a collapse is coming, rush in to take advantage of the disturbed state of things, and thereby increase the excitement and precipitate the catastrophe.

The paper money now in circulation is about $900,000,000 in the aggregate; of this $600,000,000 is in legal tenders and postal currency, and over $250,000,000 in notes of local and national banks. As if not contented with the enormous power to issue paper which the liberality of Congress and his own mechanical facilities supplied, Mr. Chase, the late Secretary of the Treasury, as the crowning act of his policy, gave origin to a scheme for filling the cities of the country with subordinate establishments whose function was to be to emit their paper as fast as possible, and which, so far as they have been organized, are industriously at work to answer the end of their creation. It is not difficult to see now that we are reaching the only result which such a policy was capable to produce, in a universal inflation of prices, a general dissipation of confidence, rapid and intense fluctuation in market value, and in those panics by which a universal collapse is always preceded. Some of my friends on the other side of the House, who looked on tranquilly at the time the mischief was being done, have now become alarmed, and call for a suspension of the issues of the national banks and for measures against State banks which shall in their operations be equivalent to the extinguishment of those institutions. As is the case with all panic-stricken people, they want now to run from the point of extreme inflation to that of extreme compression, and administer a course of heroic remedies which may cure the disease at the expense of what little life remains in the patient.

That Mr. Chase did in the details of his financial system commit mistakes which are destined in their effects to add severity to the impending catastrophe and hinder the process of recovery is undeniable; but the principle of his system was prescribed to him by the circumstances, and he could not alter it. He was counseled to emit paper money, knowing that the issue would induce inflation, and inflation collapse, or submit to an immediate bankruptcy which would have stopped the war. The Government had no credit, and therefore could not borrow; and talk as you may now about taxation, and it is the only remedy in the present emergency of the country—taxation would, had it been pursued to the extent to meet accruing expenses, have brought on a popular reaction which would either have put an end to hostilities or brought on a revolution.

Mr. Nathan Appleton, one of the ablest financiers of the present century, maintained that an expansion of the currency tends to an advance of prices, excites commercial enterprise, and finally speculation and overtrade. High prices encourage importation and discourage exportation; a rise in the foreign exchange follows, which causes an export of specie, which acts as a corrective by compelling the banks to call in a portion of their issues. This is done by lessening or suspending their usual discounts. Here is action and reaction, very beautiful, and all very agreeable to the public, except the last part of the process. A contraction of the currency causes a contraction of the money market, reduces prices, paralyzes trade, brings on failures. This is all very disagreeable—it makes what is called hard times. But in fact it is always a return from a false position to a true one; it is never necessary to diminish a currency which has not been redundant. The violence of the pressure is always in proportion to the extent of the overtrade; and generally the more violent the pressure the shorter the period.

The incalculable evils of that frequent fluctuation to which the elasticity of paper money necessarily subjects any currency of which it forms a large proportion, must be fully admitted; its constant tendency to expansion, the effect of this in the rise of prices, and the excitement of the spirit of speculation; the next consequence in overthrowing the just, natural balance between importation and exportation, discouraging the latter and stimulating the former; the necessary result of this is the creation of a balance of foreign debt, with a rise of exchange and efflux of specie; the consequent drain upon the banks, in whose vaults alone it is to be found, and where it serves as the basis of five times its own amount of bank paper in circulation; with finally, the consequent reaction, in a violent contraction of the currency, pressure upon the money market, suffering of the community, commercial bankruptcies, derangement of the measure of all outstanding contracts, distress, dishonesty, demoralization, and a wide and far ramification of evil effects, extending throughout the whole political and social system, which no effort of calculation could even attempt to follow. The greatest folly which the madness of the hour has engendered is the supposition that national banks can equalize exchange. The expense of exchange must be borne by the debtors in the debtor part of the country, and every attempt to give a different direction to it will be baffled. Gallatin observes:

"The great inequality and fluctuations of the domestic exchanges, so far as they are the fault of depreciated currencies, cannot be remedied by a national bank, as long as they continue to be the local circulating medium. After that evil shall have been removed by a resumption of specie payment, the bank cannot and ought not to interfere any further than as purchasers and sellers of exchange and drafts in the same manner as other dealers. But it is a great mistake to suppose that it can afford a generally uniform currency, or one which shall at the same time be of the same value in all places. This is to confound exchange and currency. The fluctuations in the rate of exchange, like those in the market price of commodities, depend on the relative amount of supply and demand, and these again on the relative indebtedness and actual means of making remittances. A national bank may find it possible and convenient to give occasional facilities in that respect, but it can no more issue a currency, necessarily payable, at the option of the holder, in several places, than a merchant can bind himself to be ready to pay a debt at five or six different places, at the option of his creditor, without notice."

With equal effect does Mr. Appleton show the fallacy of the idea so commonly entertained by the friends of a national bank, of its utility as a regulator of the currency. He shows how far from truth is the assumption, usually made in its behalf, that it was by the establishment of the United States Bank that the currency was restored after the war; and presenting a rapid outline or sketch of its history, he proves what he asserts, namely, that "as a regulator of the currency its success was not remarkable."

I have thus endeavored to prove, sir, that there are serious objections to the establishment of banks of the magnitude and power necessary to the regulation of the currency. In the first place such a power is wholly at variance with the spirit of our institutions, which are founded upon the principle of free competition, of action and reaction among equals. A great central power, independent of the General or State Governments is an anomaly in our system. Such a power over the currency is the most tremendous which can be established. Without the assurance that it will be managed by men free from the common imperfections of human nature, we are safer without it. Under a system of free competition, if one bank or one city go wrong, the evil is soon rectified. The laws of trade, left to themselves, will soon cure the evils of individual misconduct or speculation. But if the regulator itself goes wrong, there is no remedy, or none without a convulsion.

In estimating the probable public debt, interest, expenses of the Government, &c., at the close of the war, I stated in the last session of the House, as follows:

"We may be sure that we cannot compel a population numbering eight millions, and equating ourselves in courage, determination, and all the essential elements of military character and power, to submit to the absolute control of our Government unless we have a standing army of at least three hundred thousand men. At sea we shall need a force quite as powerful as at present. Our civil list will be increased by the large number of officials necessary to collect the additional revenue required for the support of the Army and Navy. I endeavor to estimate, on the most moderate basis, the amount of our expenditure when such a peace as is sought by the majority of this House shall be attained. We shall need annually, at least, for—

The War Department.....	$300,000,000
The Navy Department.....	100,000,000
Interest on public debt, of say $3,000,000,000..	180,000,000
Civil list, collection of revenue, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous.....	40,000,000
Interior, pensions, Indians, &c.....	25,000,000

Total.....$645,000,000

"If the South should willingly return to the Union we shall, at least, need an army of a hundred thousand men. Taking this estimate and reducing the cost of the War Department by two thirds, there will yet remain the necessity for a revenue of $450,000,000, to be paid by taxation and duties."

I have seen no reason since to change the views then expressed. The problem to be solved is this—how to raise the required amount to sustain the credit of the Government with the least possible injury to the operative, or non-capitalized classes, and with the slightest pressure on the industrial and commercial interests of the country. If capital or wealth be taken as the standard of taxation, the solution of the question will be easily worked out, so far as respects material interests. The chief intention of the war is the protection of capital. But for the wealth of the country being endangered in the event of the success of the rebellion, there would have been no necessity for a resort to hostilities; if therefore the war is waged in the interest of capital, it is only natural justice that capital should chiefly pay its cost. Moreover, the foundation of our national prosperity rests on the remunerative character of the labor of the lower classes, while the safety of our political institutions lies in the contentment of that class of population. Let the savings of the sinewy masses be swallowed up in taxation, and the growth of our wealth is arrested by a disease at its root. Let the working people, that constitute a large majority of the population, be taxed beyond their share in the material interests of the country, and in paying the expenses of one revolution we sow the seeds of another. The only method of avoiding the creation of class distinctions, and escaping an aristocracy of capital, is to see to it that the citizen is taxed as nearly as possible in proportion to his means. Any system of taxation that does not draw revenue chiefly from the classes best able to pay is inconsistent with republican institutions, and must ultimately be overthrown by the vote of the masses, or itself overthrow the democratic constitution of society.

It seems to me evident that our only reliance is upon a judicious system of taxation. Our legislation of late in relation to the imposition of duties upon the importation of foreign goods has greatly diminished our revenue from that source, and for a time, at least, we cannot expect much in that direction.

The Journal of Commerce of New York, a most valuable, reliable, and influential commercial paper, very justly says:

"The tariff adopted on the 30th of June last will have the effect of checking the process of supplying our wants in foreign markets. The duties are so enormously heavy that it is next to impossible to import any important amount of goods. It necessitates the importer to have literally two capitals, one for paying for his goods, and a second for paying his duties. A merchant buying in England £20,000 worth of dry goods requires $100,000 in gold to remit in payment, and at the same time has to deposit about $50,000 in gold at the custom-house. The absorption of so much capital in duties, of course, reduces the importer's means for purchasing; and the consequence is that the amount of the imports declines. The importer has to add the additional duty to the price of his goods, and must charge his ordinary rate of profit upon the extra duty, resulting in such an increase of the prices of goods as limits their consumption. The effect of these tendencies is clearly apparent in the large reduction of the volume of the imports since the enhanced duties went into operation. For the six months ending June 30, 1864, the period when the new tariff went into operation, the imports were $138,500,000; for the succeeding six months the imports were only $80,000,000, showing a decline of $58,500,000 during the first six months under the enhanced tariff. And during the first seven weeks of the current calendar year, the imports have been only $13,500,000, or at the rate of $100,000,000 per annum, which is equivalent to a reduction of $118,000,000, as compared with the imports of last year."

It is worthy of note, sir, how England, the heavily and yet the best taxed of all countries, derives her revenue. It appears from the account of public income and expenditure, published by order of the House of Commons of Great Britain on the 6th February, 1863, that with an exception trifling in comparison with the amount under consideration, the interest on nearly $4,000,000,000, the national debt of that country, is entirely paid by the duties on two articles, spirituous liquors and tobacco. The interest for the year ending 31st March, 1862, was $25,541,706, or about $128,700,000, while the revenue derived from the above sources during the same year was $123,730,000. An income of about $50,000,000 more is derived from tea, sugar, and molasses. Coffee, currants, raisins, and pepper furnish $4,002,000. About $5,000,000 are raised from duties on imported grain and timber, $1,500,000 from paper, $7,500,000 from excise licenses and post-horse duties. From charges on bills of lading, game certificates, railways, stage, and hackney carriages, accrue about $4,500,000. From these few sources alone, excepting a few miscellaneous articles yielding about $1,000,000, the British Government derives $41,985,495, about $20,500,000, almost entirely from the duties of luxury and superfluity. From stamps is derived a revenue of $8,590,654, or $42,500,000; assessed and land taxes, $16,000,000; property income tax, $10,471,208, or $52,000,000; post office, $16,097,000; miscellaneous revenues, about $10,000,000; in all an income of $69,900,859 during the year in question. The total charges of collecting the revenue during the same year were $2,511,120, or about $12,500,000. The salaries and expenses of both Houses of Parliament (including printing) were £1,583,812, about $7,500,000. The expenses of courts of justice, police, &c., were £3,433,138, or $17,000,000, much more than twice those of the civil government. The diplomatic service cost $2,100,000. The cost of naval and military forces, including operations in China, cost of fortifications, &c., was $151,500,000. The various miscellaneous expenses, including £2,131,338 for the post office, (being about $7,000,000 less than the income from it,) were £7,622,277. The whole expenditures during 1862 having been £72,151,786, (about $360,000,000,) exceeding (£69,900,857) the income during the same year by £2,250,929, or about $11,000,000.

The last British report (1864) shows the following amount of revenue, and the sources from whence derived:

Customs.....	£23,232,000
Excise.....	18,207,000
Stamps.....	9,317,000
Taxes.....	3,218,000
Property and income tax.....	9,084,000
Post office.....	3,810,000
Crown lands.....	305,000
Old stores and extra receipts, naval and military departments.....	631,993
Surplus fees, extra receipts, civil departments, unclaimed dividends.....	2,403,971
	£70,208,964

As we must mainly rely in the future upon a proper system of taxation, I hope the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a commission consisting of three persons to inquire and report at the earliest practicable moment upon the subject of raising by taxation such revenue as may be necessary in order to supply the wants of the Government, will be adopted by this Congress, as such a plan is eminently proper with a view to make taxation bear justly and impartially upon the people.

The bill under consideration is objectionable in permitting a further issue of Treasury notes. The tendency will be, I fear, further inflation of the currency, with all the attending consequences. I had hoped that some plan for funding the public debt would have been presented at the present session. We must at the earliest moment return to a sound system of finance; the great excess of paper issue must be withdrawn, the expenses of the Government diminished, and the debt funded and placed in process of liquidation, or the country will culminate in general bankruptcy, and perhaps repudiation. While the resources of the country are not adequate to meet the present and accruing liabilities, still upon the return of peace we may hope for such a rapid development of the vast wealth of the country as will enable the people to bear lightly the gigantic debt that will be created during the war between contending States whose greatness and power depend upon unity instead of separation.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

SPEECH OF HON. GEO. H. PENDLETON, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1865,

On the bill (H. R. No. 214) to provide that the heads of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express to the House my thanks for the courtesy by which, at this late hour of the session, I am permitted to address it. My acknowledgments will be made most fittingly by an earnest endeavor so to avail myself of that permission that no honorable gentleman upon the floor will regret that it was unanimously given. The bill before the House is in these words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, shall be entitled to occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives, with the right to participate in debate upon matters relating to the business of their respective Departments, under such rules as may be prescribed by the House.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Secretaries, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, shall attend the sessions of the House of Representatives immediately on the opening of the sittings on Mondays and Thursdays of each week, to give information in reply to questions which may be propounded to them under the rules of the House.

If no other good result shall come from this discussion, we have at least gained this: that every gentleman who has participated in the debate—of whatever shade of political opinion, whatever views he may have taken of this particular measure—has declared that the powers of the executive department of the Government ought not to be increased. I sympathize entirely with that opinion, and it is because I believe that this measure, if adopted, will exercise a restraining influence upon an overgrown and now abnormal power that I am so strenuous in its advocacy. The gentleman who sits behind me [Mr. Cox] and the gentleman from Vermont, not now in his seat, [Mr. Morrill,] oppose this measure because, in their opinion, it will increase the powers of the executive department of the Government. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who sits over the way opposes it because he thinks it will diminish the powers of the Executive. I will not stop here to place their arguments side by side to antagonize each other. These gentlemen all agree that this measure is unconstitutional; that it encroaches upon the rights of the States, and that it will destroy the legitimate influence of Congress under the Constitution.

If I believed the adoption of this measure would require an amendment of the Constitution I would abandon it instantly, for I have too long resisted any amendment of that instrument to commend it now. If I believed that it trench upon the rights of the States I would abandon it at once, for I am firmly persuaded that consolidation is despotism, and that confederation is liberty. If I believed that it would increase the powers of the Executive I would abandon it at once, for I believe, in the language of a celebrated resolution of another day and country, that the influence of the Executive has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. I accept the doctrine put forward by my colleague with such emphasis, that they who advocate a change must support it by argument, and I propose to show that the measure which this committee reports is constitutional; that it will not infract the rights of the States; that it will elevate the character of this House; that it will elevate the character of the Departments; that it will benefit both legislation and administration.

I address myself at once, sir, to the constitutionality of this measure. Its constitutionality depends upon the answer to two questions: first, has this House the power to open its doors and invite to the floor any person whom it chooses, with such rights of speech as it may see fit to confer; and next, has Congress—not the House alone, but Congress—the power to impose upon the heads of Departments such duties as it believes appropriately belong to the positions they hold? The power of this House to open its doors to whomsoever it sees fit I will not argue, in face of the constitutional guarantee that it "shall determine the rules of its proceedings," and in the face of the uniform practice—never departed from—from the time the First Congress was organized until the day, within two weeks, when, by your permission, General Grant in the Speaker's chair received the obeisance of its members. The power of Congress to impose duties upon the heads of the Departments I will not argue, in face of the law organizing the Treasury Department, enacted in 1789, under which that Department has been administered up to this date, by the terms of which, by a simple resolution, the Secretary may be required to come upon the floor and explain the measures which he recommends; and in the face of every law which has been passed for the organization of the Executive Departments, from that day to this, commanding every one of these Secretaries to report, in one case or another, directly to Congress.

It seems to me that the answers to these two questions settle the constitutional power. If this House has the right to open its doors and invite these Secretaries to be present, and if Congress has the right to say to these Secretaries that it is their duty to accept the invitation of the House, there would seem to be no question of power left.

But gentlemen say that this argument is too technical, that it sticks in the bark; that such may be the construction of the letter but not the spirit of the Constitution. And we are told that these heads of Departments are the clerks, the deputies, the agents, of the President; that they think with his thoughts; speak with his voice, and act with his hands; that their acts are his acts; that they are amenable to him, and not to Congress, and that to admit them to participate in legislation would be violative of the fundamental maxim of all successful free governments—that the great departments must be kept distinct and separate; and violative of the constitutional rights of the Executive. And both the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] and my colleague [Mr. COX] quoted the celebrated saying of Montesquieu, that “There can be no liberty when the legislative and executive powers are united in the same body or person, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate may enact tyrannical laws and execute them in a tyrannical manner; or, were the power of judging joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control, for the judge would then be legislator; were it joined to the executive the judge might have all the violence of the oppressor.” It was in this connection that my colleague, [Mr. COX,] referring to the forty-seventh number of the Federalist, cited the authority of Mr. Madison as sustaining his position. The gentleman is a skillful debater. He reads extracts and cites authorities with great judgment. Mr. Madison is made to appear to be supporting the theory advanced by the gentleman, while every student of the Federalist knows that the paper cited is devoted to showing that Montesquieu made that remark in admiration of the theory of the parliamentary Government of England, whose chief feature and characteristic is that her statesmen adopted early and adhered tenaciously to the idea of responsibility of ministers to Parliament, and required the presence of the ministers on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Madison says:

“The oracle who is always consulted and cited on this subject is the celebrated Montesquieu. If he be not the author of the invaluable precept in the science of politics, he has at least the merit of displaying and recommending it most effectually to the attention of mankind.”

“The British Constitution was to Montesquieu what Homer has been to didactic writers on epic poetry. As the latter have considered the work of the immortal bard as the perfect model from which the principles and rules of the epic art were to be drawn, and by which all similar works were to be judged, so this great political critic appeared to have viewed the Constitution of England as the standard, or, to use his own expression, as the mirror of political liberty; and to have delivered in the form of elementary truths the several characteristic principles of that particular system.”

“His meaning, as his own words import, and still more conclusively as illustrated by the example in his eye, can amount to no more than this, that where the whole power of one department is exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another department, the fundamental principles of free government are subverted.”

When I shall propose a measure liable to such description the gentleman may quote this condemnation. At the end of this paper Mr. Madison tells us for what purpose it was written. He says:

“What I have wished to evince is that the charge brought against the proposed Constitution of violating a sacred maxim of free government, is warranted neither by the real meaning annexed to that maxim by its author, nor by the sense in which it has hitherto been understood in America.”

And it was in this same connection, if I am not mistaken, that my colleague [Mr. COX] said that the argument which had been made in relation to the veto power of the President proved too much. He says:

“The veto power of the President is the limit of presidential interference, and its exercise is allowed only after the law is passed.”

Has my colleague forgotten that by the terms of the Constitution the President is bound to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and that he does it always at the opening of every session, and frequently during the session, and that now, as it has been from the beginning, in those communications he recommends such legislation as he desires?

But, Mr. Speaker, this argument in relation to the unity of the Executive—the identity in office of the several heads of the Departments with the President himself—has been pushed to the extreme, and in the course of this discussion it has been asked by some gentleman, perhaps my colleague: “If it be proper to call the Cabinet to the House, why not call in the President?” The answer to that question involves the whole argument as to the constitutionality of the proposed bill, and the answer is very plain. The question assumes that the heads of Departments are part of the constitutional Executive of the country.

That is not true. They aid him, as the law prescribes they shall aid him, in the performance of certain duties. But the President is the constitutional Executive; he is the whole executive department. He, and he alone, is the coordinate branch of the Government. Our law recognizes no council of state; our law recognizes no Cabinet, in the sense in which that term is generally used. The President has no authority of law to call the Secretaries together for consultation. It does not belong to the theory of the Constitution. The President, and he alone, is the responsible Executive. His duties are prescribed, his powers are defined by the Constitution itself; and it is right that he should exercise those duties, and in doing so should exert those powers without the consent, ay, if need be, even in defiance, of the obstructions of Congress.

That is not the case with these heads of Departments. The President has no more authority over them than he has over any other officer. He has the power of appointment; and even that might be taken away from him by Congress. He has the power of dismissal; that follows upon the power of appointment. There his power ends. They are the creatures of our law. Their offices are established, their duties prescribed, their term of office and their emoluments defined by our law; and they perform the duties we assign to them only by the powers we give them. We may repeal the law, and the offices fall.

This is the reason why we may bring these Secretaries, and why we may not bring the President upon the floor of the House. The President is, by the Constitution, a coordinate branch of the Government. Congress can no more interfere with the constitutional duties and powers of the President than he can interfere with the constitutional duties and powers with which Congress has been invested. These men occupy no such position. They are the creatures of our will, amenable to our authority, bound to obey our voice and to perform such duties as we may prescribe to them.

A strange delusion, it seems to me, has grown up upon this subject. There is in this whole Government, so far as my examination has extended, but one single officer who can fairly and properly be called a minister of the President, and he is the Secretary of State. If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the organization of his Department, they will find that he is to perform such duties in connection with foreign relations as the President may prescribe. The language of the law declares that he “shall perform and execute such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined upon or intrusted to him by the President of the United States, agreeably to the Constitution, relative to correspondence, commissions or instructions to or with public ministers or consuls from the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign States or princes; or to memorials from foreign public ministers or other foreigners, or to such other matters respecting foreign affairs as the President of the United States shall assign to such Department.” He, and he alone, by reason of that law, stands toward the President in the relation of a minister. Why was that exception made? Because under the Constitution the President of the United States is invested with the authority to make treaties and appoint foreign ministers, with the consent of the Senate; and it has been held, whether rightly or wrongfully I will not now undertake to say, that the President, at his own option, by his mere volition, without the authority of Congress, may appoint such foreign ministers as he sees fit. In the law organizing the Treasury Department there is no corresponding provision. The duties of the Secretary are defined, and he is made responsible to Congress itself. He is not responsible to the President; he has no responsibility to him except in so far as that is derived from the power of appointment and dismissal.

The organization of the War Department also shows that while by the first law the Secretary was “to perform and execute such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined upon or intrusted to him by the President of the United States, agreeably to the Constitution, relative to military commissions, or to the military or naval forces, ships, or warlike stores of the United States, or to such other matters respecting military or naval affairs as the President shall assign to that Department,” yet at the same session, and from that time forward, and during the first ten years of the existence of the Government, laws were passed defining and limiting his duties, and investing the Secretary with a discretion independent of the President.

The same will be found to be the fact in relation to the Navy Department. I will not cite the provisions of that law, with which gentlemen are doubtless familiar; but if the House will bear with me for one moment I will call attention to the organization of the Interior Department and of the Attorney General’s Department. In the law organizing the Department of the Interior there will be found not a section, not a clause, not a word, from the beginning to the end, which indicates any special accountability by the Secretary to the President. On the contrary, in relation to the public lands, in relation to the Indian tribes, in relation to certain public accounts, discretion is expressly vested in the head of that Department. When gentlemen speak of a Cabinet council, and the unity of the Secretaries with the President, forming with him a coordinate branch of the Government, I ask them to look at a single section of the law organizing the office of the Attorney General:

“There shall be appointed a meet person learned in the law to act as Attorney General for the United States, who shall be sworn or affirmed to a faithful execution of the office, whose duty it shall be to prosecute and conduct all suits in the Supreme Court in which the United States shall be concerned, and to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law when required by the President of the United States, or when requested by the heads of any of the Departments touching any matters that may concern their Departments, and shall receive such compensation for his services as shall by law be provided.”

And yet the claim is made here, with that single section prescribing all the duties of the Attorney General and defining his Department—the pretense is made here that he is part of the constitutional Executive of the Government. I might go further. In the law in relation to pensions which I find on page 755 of Brightly’s Digest it is expressly provided—

“That the heads of Departments who may severally be charged with the administration of the pension laws of the United States, be, and they hereby are, respectfully directed and required, as soon as may be after the opening of each session of Congress, to present to the Senate and House of Representatives a several list of such persons, whether revolutionary, invalid, or otherwise, as shall have made application for a pension, or an increase of pension, and as, in their opinion, respectively, ought to be placed upon the pension roll, or otherwise provided for, and for doing which they have no authority.”

Every Department of this Government, every head of every Department, charged in any way with the payment of pensions is compelled under that law to report directly to Congress his action on it, and his views not only upon the proper administration of the law, but the changes that ought to be made in the law. And yet we are told that these gentlemen are part of the constitutional Executive, and so identified with the President, so entirely his ministers, his agents, his executing hands, we have no power to bring them before the House itself!

Such has been the uniform course of legislation, and the uniform course of judicial decision has established and maintained it. If gentlemen will look at the first volume of Cranch’s Reports in the Supreme Court of the United States they will find the case of Marbury vs. Madison, in which it was decided that so far as these Cabinet officers were compelled to perform ministerial duties, writs of mandamus would lie to compel their performance; but that so far as they were called upon to exercise discretion their accountability was to the political and not to the judicial tribunals. When Mr. Madison refused to issue from the office of the Secretary of State a commission for a justice of peace in this District it was held that he could, by the interference of the courts, be compelled to perform that duty, but that when he refused to exercise a discretion vested in him the court had no power to supervise his action, but must remit him to the political tribunals of the country and the people. An unbroken line of decisions following the authority of that early case settles that question conclusively.

I need not call the attention of legal gentlemen to the famous case of Stockton & Stokes against Kendall, in which this whole subject was argued with signal ability. The case is reported in 12th Peters's Reports. During the discussion the same argument made here was pressed upon the attention of the court, but in the decision—the opinion of the court as well as in the dissenting opinions—not a doubt was expressed that there was the same accountability on the part of those who presided in the various Executive Departments which exists on the part of every other officer in the Government. Judge Marshall delivered the opinion in the first case; Judge Taney dissented from the judgment of the court in the second case, but he expressly affirmed the rule of decision which I have endeavored to establish. The case of Decatur and Paulding, reported in 14th Peters, and the case of Brashear & Mason, 6th Howard, establish the same rule, it seems to me, beyond all doubt.

Cabinet Officers in Congress—Mr. Pendleton.

Mr. Speaker, I am not left to the legislation of the country and to judicial decisions alone; I have the authority of Mr. Clay also. In his famous speech on the removal of the deposits he says:

"But by what authority does the Secretary assert that the Treasury Department is one of the Executive Departments of the Government? He has none in the act which creates the Department; he has none in the Constitution."

"* * * * * Except the appointment of the officers with the cooperation of the Senate, and the power which is exercised of removing them, the President has neither by the Constitution nor by the law making the Department anything to do with it. The Secretary's reports and responsibility are directly to Congress. The whole scheme of the Department is one of checks, each officer acting as a control upon his associates. The Secretary is required to report, not to the President, but to Congress. Either House may require any report from him, or command his personal attendance before it. It is not therefore true that the Treasury is one of the Executive Departments, subject to the supervision of the President."

In another speech which he made during the presidential campaign in 1840, speaking of this same subject, he says:

"As to the gratuitous assumption made by President Jackson of responsibility for all the subordinate executive officers, it is the merest mockery that was ever put forth."

Professor Lieber, in his Treatise on Civil Liberty, says:

"The Constitution of the United States prohibits any officer of the United States from being a member of either House; and the law does not allow the members of the Administration seats and the right to speak in the Houses, as some think a law to that effect ought to be passed."

And in a later authority from Professor Lieber's own hand, I know his opinion is that the time has come when the law as it exists should be changed.

But if there were any doubt left upon the question of power, as I think there cannot be, I need only call the attention of gentlemen to that clause of the Constitution which is so familiar to us, that Congress shall have power—

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof."

And I would like to know if gentlemen are prepared now, when they are making such exhausting drafts upon the great reservoir of implied powers, to deny to Congress the right of calling upon these men for their aid, if Congress shall believe it can in that way better perform the functions with which it has been charged by the Constitution.

I pass from this argument of constitutional power. The proposition which is made to the House by the committee of which I had the honor to be a member is twofold: that it shall be the duty of heads of Departments to be present on this floor, in order to give information to the House touching any subject as to which they shall be questioned; and that they shall have the right—not that it shall be a duty—to debate such measures as may pertain to their respective Departments.

The uniform practice of Congress, as every gentleman knows who has been here for one week, is to call upon the heads of Departments for information upon subjects with which their duties make them acquainted. That uniform practice establishes two or three things: first, that the heads of Departments ought to be possessed of the information; next, that it is advisable that Congress should obtain it; and lastly, that Congress has the power to demand it. And the only question on this branch of the proposition remaining is the single one whether or not the means now used by resolutions of inquiry is preferable to that which the committee recommend. It has been said during the course of this discussion that we would trench upon the right of the President to withhold information for which we may apply. If the information is of such a character that it ought not to be communicated, that answer can be made to the House, as it is now made. If the information is such as ought to be made public, and the officer is willing to give it, how much more satisfactorily can it be given when the parties meet face to face and understand each other. If the information ought to be communicated, and the officer is unwilling to give it, how long will he be able in the face of the country to stand a cross-examination here upon the subject? If the question is one of public right, or private right, affected by a good administration of a bad law, or a bad administration of a good law, how speedily can all the evils be corrected when the facts, the law, the officer, and the member complaining are brought immediately together.

My colleague, [Mr. Cox,] when he addressed the House upon this subject, with a wit which adorns his eloquence, and an elocution which gives point and pungency to his wit, described the Cabinet officers as they came upon the floor of the House. I will not compete with him in that field, but I desire to present to the House one or two other considerations. In 1861, when the States were seceding from this Union, it was charged that the officer intrusted with the administration of the War Department was sending the arms of the United States into the southern States. I see gentlemen around me who remember that fact. I was upon the Committee on the Judiciary, and a resolution of the House instructed that committee to inquire into the facts. They did so, and they did it by all the machinery which is given to an investigating committee—witnesses, subpoenas, marshals, stenographers—and after two weeks' investigation we had obtained little information upon the subject, and the evil was not corrected. Had that officer stood upon the floor of the House, subject to the interrogatories of my colleagues for five minutes, we would have known the exact truth with reference to those arms.

It is said he might have declined to answer. It is true, a man cannot be made to speak, but how long could a Secretary of War stand before this House declining to answer what he was doing with the arms of the Republic?

I believe it is equally well understood that the Secretary of the Treasury had agreed to a scheme to prevent the payment of the interest on the public debt in January of that year. It was only by the intervention of parties in New York agreeing themselves to advance the money, so that there should be no excuse whatever, that the dishonor of the Government was prevented. This fact was suspected by gentlemen here; rumors to that effect at least existed. If the Secretary had been on the floor the truth would have been readily ascertained.

A member of this House, [Mr. Kasson,] whose constituent had been aggrieved by an illegal arrest and imprisonment, applied to the Secretary of War for his release, and received the answer, "I shall not do it." And when he pressed the point he was told, "I do not propose to argue the question with you; I am responsible to the President, and to him alone." A gentleman from New York approached this Secretary within the last week, with a desire to ascertain the quota of his district under this call for three hundred thousand men, and was informed that information on that subject could not be given to members of Congress. How long would such official insolence be tolerated on the floor of this House, in the presence of these reporters who would carry it on the wings of the lightning, the next morning, to every portion of the Republic?

But, sir, a more striking instance of the benefit of this proposed change is to be found in a transaction in which my honorable colleague [Mr. Cox] bore a part. Early this session he introduced a resolution in relation to the exchange of prisoners. He pressed it with that ability and constancy which are characteristic of him, and finally, on the 21st day of December a resolution was passed by the House calling on the Secretary of War for information on that subject. The answer came on the 21st day of January, one month afterward. It informed us that prior to the time when Congress met the whole subject of exchanges had been committed to Lieutenant General Grant, and that there was every prospect of a speedy exchange.

And at that time—the knowledge of many such instances no doubt prompted the generous heart of my colleague to his action in this matter—there lay in one of the southern prisons a young man who a little while before had been vigorous and strong, with courage high and hope buoyant and energy unflagging. Excited by a generous enthusiasm he had entered the Army of the Republic and was taken prisoner. Disease, suffering, confinement, the want of food, the want of clothing, the horrors of a prison life, had bowed his manly frame until his emaciated body could scarcely support his hardly less broken spirit. If this answer of the Secretary of War had been returned upon the day the question was asked, as it would have been if the Secretary had been on the floor; if on that day the House and the country had been told that General Grant had charge of the exchanges with every prospect of success, thousands of mourning hearts would have been comforted; and by that mysterious influence which seems to pervade all nature, the very air of the prison where this man languished, tainted with miasma as it was, would have brought to him at least one element of life in hope. But the Secretary did not answer for a month. The frail, and feeble, and worn-out body could not sustain the agonies of a hopeless heart, and before the answer came his body lay in the shallow trenches of a prison cemetery and his soul had appealed to the mercies of the God who gave it.

Sir, there are advantages connected with having a prompt response to our questions which cannot be compensated for by any supposed objections to bringing these gentlemen upon the floor of the House.

* I pass now to that portion of the proposition which involves the right of debate. All gentlemen, I believe, admit that there are certain advantages connected with the participation of these Secretaries in the discussions of the House. The objection made is that they would unduly influence members here, and that there would be a too intimate consolidation of the legislative and executive, and that legislation would not be free.

I will not pause here to inquire how it is that there can be any violation of the rights of the Executive by this measure if—

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman now claim that the law of 1818 and the provisions of each special law for the organization of a Territory, that Delegates from Territories shall be elected "for the same term of two years for which members of the House of Representatives are elected, and in that House each of the said Delegates shall have a seat with the right of debating but not voting," which is reported by the committee as a precedent for this bill, is a precedent in this case?

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not claim that it is a precedent directly in point, but it is an admission of a power in Congress exactly analogous to that which I propose now to exercise.

Mr. ROGERS. The right of electing Delegates to Congress is derived from the provision of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States, and is so expressly laid down in Kent's Commentaries, pages 280 and 281.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I was making the remark when the gentleman interrupted me, that I did not see how it was that this measure would trench upon the just power of the Executive Departments if the result is to be, as now claimed, the subordination of Congress to the influence of those Departments. Nor do I quite understand the position assumed by gentlemen, that they will not vote for this measure which we propose, because it gives the Secretaries too much power, but that they would vote for it if it were so framed that resignation should follow an adverse vote. If the Secretaries were to be stimulated by fear of loss of office, would their exertions be less strenuous, or their power less actively used?

The result of this law would be to diminish the illegitimate power of the Secretaries, not their legitimate power. I take things as I find them. I will not be misled by a theory to deny a fact. For the seventy-five years that this Government has been in operation the heads of Departments have exercised influence on legislation. Every gentleman knows it. Every member of this House recollects the scene two or three days ago on the floor when the loan bill was discussed. Every member who has been in the Senate Chamber since that time has seen Cabinet officers there exercising this influence. I will not shut my eyes to the fact that this power exists because I would not have it exist. Every gentleman knowing that it exists knows that every means consistent with its exercise is taken to conceal its existence. It is secret, and therefore it is insidious. It denies itself, therefore it is hypocritical. Being secret and hypocritical, and nevertheless always existing, and always stimulated to great activity, it is driven by the law of its life to the use of illegitimate and improper means. I propose a change. I propose to strip from it the mask, to bring it out into open day, to take away from it the pretense that it does not exist. I propose that it shall acknowledge its existence. And then I propose to establish for it a channel of influence which shall be open to the observation of the House and country, so that an intelligent, wise, and discriminating public opinion, knowing that this power does exist by acknowledgment of law, shall be able to understand the means by which it is exercised, and to restrain its influence to the proper results of those means. I propose to substitute open argument, fair debate, intellectual power, knowledge of facts, for private conversations, partisan appeals, promise of secret reward. Then the influence of the executive officers will be diminished, exactly as much as reason is less potent than persuasion, and as argument is less effective than patronage. Why are advocates allowed to address juries in open court, but not to go into the jury room? Why are they never restrained in the use of any argument, any sophistry, any appeal to prejudice, or even to passion? Because public opinion restrains the influence of such considerations to its proper point. Because it weighs well the force which ought to be given to them and by its judgment compels jurors to do the same and thus robs them of all their capacity for evil.

My colleague [Mr. Cox] told us in the course of his argument that the encroachments which had been made on prerogative in England were made by reaction only, and not through the instrumentality and influence of the British House of Commons. Is that true? Has the gentleman forgotten the brilliant history of the House of Commons? Has he forgotten Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, the Bill of Rights, the Grand Remonstrance, Habeas Corpus, the Statutes of Treason? Has he forgotten that Strafford was beheaded, and Clarendon was banished, and Danby was imprisoned, and Oxford was committed to the Tower, and Bolingbroke and Ormond were attainted? Has he forgotten that Bute, sustained by all the power of a young and brilliant king, was disgraced in thirteen months? Has he forgotten that North, beloved by his sovereign, was at last driven from power? Has he forgotten that, to-day, sustained by the British House of Commons, the man who, in public life, is most obnoxious to the Queen of England, is the Premier of that kingdom? The struggles of the British Parliament in behalf of liberty form the brightest page in the history of England. Its achievements may well thrill the heart of every Englishman as he recounts those heroic deeds, before the luster of whose brilliant glories Agincourt and Cressy and Blenheim and the Peninsula and Waterloo "pale their ineffectual fires." Has he forgotten that it was the constancy and heroism and fortitude of that struggle of seven centuries which inspired the genius of the greatest of modern British poets, when, surrounded by all the inspiring scenes of Grecian patriotism and Grecian valor, standing upon the graves of Thermopylae, he wrote:

"For freedom's battle, once begun,
Bequeathed by bleeding sire to son,
Though baffled oft, is ever won."

Sir, the gentleman has read history aright, and so deep an impression had these facts made upon him that in the midst of his speech, in direct contradiction to the philosophy of his argument and his illustration, he says:

"When the Tudors ascended the throne the contest began which has ended, in this reign of Queen Victoria, in the subordination of nearly all executive power to the ministry, or to the Parliament which can overturn the ministry."

Mr. COX. With the permission of my colleague, [Mr. PENDLETON,] I desire to say this: I have not forgotten, nor did I forget in my remarks, the brilliant history of the British House of Commons. What that House has done, not only for British liberty but for American liberty, I need not show. My argument was that this progress in liberty was made by the English House of Commons and the English people in spite of this very ministerial influence which I would seek to keep out of these Halls.

Mr. PENDLETON. And yet the result of the existence of that House with this ministerial influence which my colleague [Mr. Cox] has so much deprecated, has been that, marching along with stately step for seven hundred years, the people of England have arrived at a degree of liberty which no other people upon the earth, except our own, enjoy. I would follow the history and experience of that Parliament; I would open the dark doors of these Departments; I would expose their doings to the light of day; I would have them accountable to the people; I would have them in correspondence with the Representatives of the people upon this floor; I would prevent that hidden corruption which, at work in secret places, is threatening the very foundations of liberty in this land. No corner should be so dark, no transaction should be so secret, no question should be so important, no condition of affairs should be so delicate, that I would not open it to the gaze of that people upon whose will depend Presidents and Cabinets and Congresses. If this can be accomplished; if that corrupt influence can be cut off; if the power which secretly saps the foundations of our national edifice can be destroyed; if these officers can be brought to exert on our legislation the influence to which their character, their intellectual powers, their information entitle them, this House will more wisely legislate, and they themselves, receiving aid from us, will more effectually discharge the duties which have been devolved upon them.

Time fails me to present all the considerations which crowd upon me in favor of this bill. I had intended to follow its history in other countries and under other systems of government. In no other Government than our own does the rule of exclusion exist. In no other Government is the power of the executive so great as in ours. I had intended to show the progression of statesmen under this system—that from the mere panders to executive dictation and the purchasers of votes by corruption, they became statesmen and publicists worthy to control the destinies of Europe, and to subsidize the military power of the continent. I had intended to demonstrate that this measure was just to the officer, just to the legislator, just to the people—that it would relieve the officer from responsibilities to which he ought not to be liable, and give him power where he ought to possess it; that it would inform and educate the legislator in those things which otherwise he could not know; and that it would excite the popular feeling and keep alive the popular sensibilities. We ought not to be surprised at these things. It is the natural, inevitable law. Hidden motives, secret actions, selfish ends, corrupt appliances—they congregate naturally. Honest purpose, open action, public advantage; reason, judgment, experience, palpable and recognized influence—these also all together demand the passage of this bill. If it shall pass, if my hopes shall be realized, if virtue shall supersede vice, if honest conviction shall be more potent or shall even be substituted for secret persuasion, I shall have renewed hope that purity, energy, wisdom will direct this House.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

SPEECH OF HON. J. F. WILSON,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1865,

On the bill (H. R. No. 214) to provide that the heads of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill proposes a radical departure from the theory of our Government. Its passage must tend to a centralization of power in the executive department, and will end in a partial surrender of the independence of this House into the keeping of the several Secretaries composing the Cabinet. Against such a departure and so baneful a result we cannot too firmly set our faces.

The influence exercised by the members of the executive branch of the Government over the action of the two Houses of Congress has long been a subject of complaint, and the dearest interests of the country have often sorely suffered from this cause. Few Administrations have existed since the adoption of the Constitution against which this complaint has not been lodged. That the committee which reported this bill fully appreciates this fact we have abundant evidence of in the report submitted to the House in support of the bill. After referring to the almost constant presence of this executive influence, the report goes on to say:

"However that may have been, the fact is too obvious to members of Congress to need proof, that the chief officers of the several Departments do exercise an important influence over the legislation of that body. The pages of the Globe within the last few years will satisfy those who have not had seats on the floor and been admitted to the sessions of the committees. It has been notorious for years that, by personal interviews with members, by private conversation at the office, in social intercourse at casual meetings on the floor of the two Houses, by verbal statements to the chairman of committees—liable always to be misunderstood or even misrepresented—by unofficial communications to the committees themselves, these officers originate, press forward, modify, or entirely defeat, measures of legislation; and it has often happened that the rules of the House have been violated by stating what has occurred in committee in order to convey to members the opinions or wishes of a Secretary."

The chairman of the committee [Mr. PENDLETON] has well stated the case in the words which I have quoted, and clearly shows how much greater is the necessity for some action to destroy the evil practices of which he complains than cause for their enlargement and legalization. Legislative action suggested, directed, controlled by such means as he describes, is entirely void of that independence of character contemplated of the framers of our Constitution. Believe the statement of the case which I have quoted from the report (and I certainly shall not question its truthfulness) and we have before us a positive evil for which a remedy cannot be too speedily found and applied. Have we such a remedy as the case demands in the bill now before the House? We are introduced to the bill by the following title:

A bill to provide that the heads of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives.

This is a remarkable title for a measure advocated as a destroyer of executive influence over the House of Representatives. The presence has been felt too much already. This is the complaint of the committee. As an antidote to this it is proposed to use the presence which is seen; and this great result is to be reached in the manner set forth in the committee's bill, which reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, shall be entitled to occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives, with the right to participate in debate upon matters relating to the business of their respective Departments, under such rules as may be prescribed by the House.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Secretaries, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General, shall attend the sessions of the House of Representatives, immediately on the opening of the sittings, on Mondays and Thursdays of each week, to give information in reply to questions which may be propounded to them under the rules of the House.

Does the committee believe that the passage of this bill will prevent the use of the means resorted to by the heads of the Executive Departments embraced in the report as a basis of complaint? Does the bill propose to interfere with the "personal interviews," "private conversations," "social intercourse at casual meetings," "verbal statements," "unofficial communications," "by means of which these officers originate, press forward, modify, or entirely defeat measures of legislation," or stop the violation of the rules of the House by forbidding the statement of "what has occurred in committee in order to convey to members the opinions or wishes of a Secretary?" The committee assert the existence of an evil. The House admits it. Does the committee propose its abatement? Not at all; but rather its legalization. The bill leaves every evil thing as it finds it, and decides to make bad worse. It substantially says to the heads of the Executive Departments, "five days in each week 'shalt thou labor, and do thy work,' and on two other days of each week we will ask you some questions about it, or inquire of you whether we had not better pass a resolution touching some subject concerning which we desire information."

To show that I am not doing injustice to the committee, I quote the following from the proposed amendments to the rules:

On Monday and Thursday of each week, before any other business shall be taken up, except by unanimous consent, the resolutions and questions shall be taken up in the order in which they have been entered upon the notice-book for that day.

The member offering a resolution may state succinctly the object and scope of his resolution and the reasons for desiring the information; and the Secretary of the proper Department may reply, giving the information or the reasons why the same should be withheld; and then, without further debate, the House shall vote on the resolution, unless it shall be withdrawn or postponed.

In putting any question to the Secretaries, or the Attorney General, or Postmaster General, no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any fact stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain such question. And in answering such question, the Secretary, the Attorney General, or Postmaster General, shall not debate the matter to which the same refers, nor state facts or opinions other than those necessary to explain the answer.

Under the operation of these rules you would have the immediate presence of the Secretaries, backed by their influence, patronage, power to reward or punish, to resist the passage of the simplest and most proper resolution of inquiry touching the affairs of the nation. We all know how difficult it is now to secure the adoption of resolutions of inquiry, especially when offered by the Opposition, of which the Secretaries have no knowledge. How much more difficult would it be if the head of an Executive Department were present standing in declared opposition to the adoption of any given resolution.

The effect of the presence of a Secretary on the floor of this House is forcibly illustrated by the committee in the appendix to the report. I quote this example from the many citations from the Globe made by the committee for the purpose of enforcing the conclusion of the report:

"MR. STEVENS offered an amendment providing, among other things, that the interest on the bonds should be paid in currency. This amendment was carried by a vote of 72 for to 51 against it. The bill thus amended was reported to the House, and on a vote of yeas and nays, on Mr. STEVENS's amendment it was defeated—yeas 59, nays 81. In the mean time the Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary had come to the House, and were then on the floor."—Page 2133.

Here, sir, almost in the twinkling of an eye, a vote of this House is changed from yeas 72, nays 51, to yeas 59, nays 81. This extraordinary result is explained by the italicized comment of the committee "in the mean time," that is, the time which elapsed between the taking of these two votes, and which we all remember was a very short time, "the Secretary of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary had come to the House, and were then on the floor."

The committee seem not to approve of this potential kind of presence. Then why not forbid it? This would seem to be the most appropriate remedy; but the committee think otherwise. The remedy of the committee is to declare by law that this thing complained of, this self-evident evil, shall be adopted as a part of the legislative and executive practice of the country, and held to be entirely right and proper.

But it is asked, concerning the Secretaries:

"Would it not be better that their opinions should be expressed, their facts stated, their policy enforced, their acts defended, in open day, on the floor of the House, in the face of the nation, in public speech, in official, recorded statement, where there can be no hidden purpose, no misconception, no misrepresentation?"

The answer to this is that it is not proposed to interfere with the means heretofore resorted to by the heads of Executive Departments to influence the action of this House. Whatever of evil now exists is to be preserved; and every gentleman in this body who has given any attention to the course pursued by the members of the British cabinet when questioned in the House of Commons concerning matters which they choose to keep to themselves or send abroad in a mist, can well anticipate the grand success which will attend the adoption of the English system by this House. When the Secretary has a good case, we will receive it from him in its brightest colors and gayest apparel. When the case stands otherwise, we shall receive just information enough to indicate the opposition of the Secretary to the passage of an unpleasant resolution of inquiry, and that will be the end of it; for it must be remembered that, under the proposed amendments to the rules, we are merely to "state the object and scope of the resolution and reasons for desiring the information, and the Secretary of the proper Department may reply, giving the information or the reasons why the same should be withheld, and then, without further debate, the House shall vote on the resolution, unless it shall be withdrawn or postponed." Who can doubt the fate of a resolution upon which a Secretary may frown, if we are to judge by the force of the mere presence of a Secretary on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] already referred to? The direct legalized contact of the heads of the Executive Departments with the action of this House can have none other than a baneful influence upon the at least theoretical independence of the legislative department of the Government.

The committee refer to the act of 1789, whereby it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury "to make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature in person or in writing (as he may be required) respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office," in support of the bill we are now considering. Sir, there is a radical difference between the provisions of the act of 1789 and the present bill. That act conferred no right upon the Secretary of the Treasury to attend the sittings of the House and engage in debate on his own motion. He was to be present when either House required his presence. The House was to judge when the presence of the Secretary might be advantageous to the affairs of the country. The proposition we are considering makes the Secretary the judge, except on two days of the week, and then he may, under the provisions of the amendments to the rules, evade the object his presence is intended to secure. The reference to the act of 1789 thus appears to be most unhappy for the purposes of the committee. Nor is the committee more successful in the presentation of precedent when they refer to the instances which occurred during the year 1789, of the presence of Secretaries in the Senate. The first case cited is the appearance of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs on July 22, 1789. This, sir, was in obedience to the following order of the Senate:

"Ordered, That the Secretary of Foreign Affairs attend the Senate to-morrow, and bring with him such papers as are requisite to give full information relative to the consular convention between France and the United States."—Annals of Congress, vol. 1, page 52.

By this order it not only appears that the Senate ordered the Secretary to appear, but determined in the same order what he should do, and what information he should communicate. The proposition of the committee is that the Secretary shall be present by right conferred by law, and combat, if he so chooses, the efforts of the House to procure information.

The second case cited by the committee is thus stated in the Annals of Congress:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The President of the United States will meet the Senate, in the Senate Chamber, at half past eleven o'clock to-morrow, to advise with them on the terms of the treaty to be negotiated with the southern Indians.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.
New York, August 21, 1789.

In pursuance of this notice the President appeared in the Senate, and the following entry was made in the proceedings:

"The President of the United States came into the Senate Chamber, attended by General Knox, and laid before the Senate the following statement of facts, with the questions thereto annexed, for their consent."—Annals of Congress, vol. 1, page 67.

That is all General Knox had to do with that transaction. He attended the President, as any other gentleman entitled to the privilege of being on the floor of the Senate, might have done. And here it is well to remind members that the early practice in relation to the delivery of messages to Congress by the President was for him to present them in person.

The next case presented by the committee is thus stated in the same volume, page 71:

"The President of the United States being present in the Senate Chamber, attended by General Knox, the Senate resumed," &c.

That is the important part performed by General Knox during his second appearance in the Senate.

The fourth precedent mentioned by the committee is thus stated in the proceedings of the Senate:

"The following message was received from the President of the United States, by General Knox, who delivered therewith sundry statements and papers relating to the same." [After this entry follows the message delivered.]—Annals of Congress, vol. 1, page 709.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in his argument in favor of the passage of this bill, dwelt on the word "statements," which occurs in this so-called precedent, with a kind of emphatic delight, as though it settled beyond dispute the fact that the Secretary of War did address the Senate orally. Never was a gentleman more mistaken. He wished it so, and believed it was so; and this is all the foundation he had for his argument.

If the gentleman will turn to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office he will find a multitude of tables under such captions as these: "Statement of the surveying returns, showing the number of acres of public lands surveyed," &c.; "Statement exhibiting the quantity of land selected for the several States," &c.; "Statement of public lands sold, of cash received therefor," &c.; "Statement showing the number of townships surveyed," &c. Are these oral communications to the House, because they are called "statements?"

The Commissioner of the General Land Office makes his report to the Secretary of the Interior. As one of the documents accompanying his report the Secretary submits it to the President, and the President forwards it to this House as one of the documents accompanying his message which is delivered to us by his Private Secretary. Now, sir, it may be truthfully said of the Private Secretary, and be entered on the Journal, that he appeared in the House and delivered a message from the President, together with "sundry statements and papers relating to the same."

The last case presented by the committee is a mere repetition of the one just noticed, and is entered in the proceedings of the Senate in these words:

"The following message was received from the President of the United States, by General Knox, who delivered the same, together with a statement of the troops in the service of the United States."—Annals of Congress, vol. 1, page 715.

The term "statement" found in this so-called precedent is susceptible of the same explanation already given. Other cases may be found, but none stronger in support of the conclusions of the committee than those which I have noticed, and they embrace all the instances quoted by the committee. And in all of these the person through whom the President communicated his messages to Congress, and who attended the President in his visit to the Senate, is mentioned as "General Knox," and not as "Secretary of War."

If the committee attach any force to the so-called precedents, it may be well for me to remind the members of it, and this House, that they all occurred during the time when the Federal party held control of Congress. The mention of this fact will doubtless recall to the recollection of the chairman of the committee [Mr. PENDLETON] many instances in which he has asserted that the Federal party was one which favored a centralization of power in the executive branch of the Government. But, sir, that party, though charged with favoring centralization, never went so far in that direction as does the bill which received the support of a majority of the committee, including the chairman, by which it was brought before the House. This bill out-Federal the Federalists. It is open-browed, undisguised centralization.

But it is said that the system now proposed for adoption by us has been adopted by Great Britain, France, Spain, Holland, the Netherlands, Portugal, Greece, Prussia, Brazil, Chili, and many other States. This is true; but it is not urged that the system works well in those countries, nor that it benefits the interests of the people. And I will venture the assertion that the committee cannot name an instance of ministerial admission to the halls of legislation which does not tend to strengthen the executive at the expense of the other departments of Government. Every one conversant with the history of the British Parliament knows how immense is the power which the ministry exerts over the deliberations and actions of the House of Commons, and how rarely defeat overtakes the cabinet.

The example of Great Britain is the most striking of all the cases cited by the committee, and yet how totally different it is from the plan we are called on to adopt. If the English system could be stripped of its power to corrupt and overawe the Commons, it would be as nearly perfect as could be desired, for under it a defeat of the ministers compels them to retire from power, unless, upon a dissolution of Parliament and an appeal to the electors, they are sustained. We can have no such thing here. We must, if we pass this bill, submit to all the evils of the British plan without enjoying any of its good features; and here it must be remembered that the members of the British cabinet have no rights on the floor of the House of Commons other than those which pertain to them as members of Parliament. They occupy their seats, speak, vote, and otherwise participate in the transaction of public business because they are members of Parliament and not because they hold ministerial positions. The ministerial office may be resigned without affecting the parliamentary office. The retiring minister remains a member of Parliament, takes his place on the opposition instead of the ministerial benches, and continues to exercise and enjoy all the rights and privileges belonging to other members of the body.

The plan presented to us is quite different, and must be so under our Constitution; for

"No person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."—Constitution of the United States, art. 1, sec. 4.

A member of the Cabinet cannot be a member of this House, so that the only right he could have on this floor would be by the virtue of his position in the executive department of the Government; a resignation of the Cabinet office would exclude him from this body also. Thus it will be seen that the British plan is no precedent for us. We could not follow it if we should desire so to do.

But, sir, to what extent are we to carry this proposition to admit persons to the privileges of this floor with the right to participate in debate? Cabinet officers have been increasing in number at intervals from the commencement of the Government down to almost our own time, and propositions are pending in some of the committees of this House to still further enlarge the number.

The Department of State was created by the act of July 27, 1789; the War Department by the act of August 7, 1789; the Treasury Department by the act of September 2, 1789; the Navy Department by the act of April 30, 1798; the Interior Department by the act of March 3, 1849. The heads of these Departments were members of the Cabinet from the first establishment of their respective offices.

The office of Attorney General was created by the act of September 24, 1789; but he did not become a Cabinet officer until, I believe, the year 1845. The act providing for the appointment of a Postmaster General was approved March 3, 1825, but, if my recollection serves me correctly, he did not become a Cabinet officer until some time afterward—I cannot now name the year.

We now have seven members of the Cabinet whose offices were created at different periods as the exigencies of the Government demanded. This bill proposes to admit them all to this floor; from which it is fair to presume that all heads of Departments which future legislation may create will be clothed with the same privilege. To what number we shall arrive the future alone can determine. During the Thirty-Seventh Congress and the present one measures have been suggested for the establishment of these additional Executive Departments: Department of Agriculture, Department of Industry, Department of Mines and Mineral Lands, and a Department of Internal Revenue. Should these propositions receive the approval of Congress four more Cabinet officers would be added to the number it is now proposed to admit to the privileges of this floor, making eleven in all. How many more may be added in response to the demands of the marvelous development of our material resources no man can tell. But it is not difficult to determine the power a numerous body of men holding the immense patronage of the Executive Departments in their hands would exercise upon the deliberations of this House. There is no safety in following the line of action which this bill marks out.

Mr. Speaker, thus far my remarks have been guided by the state of facts now existing. The executive and legislative departments of the Government are possessed by the same political party. But another state of facts may hereafter be produced, and then we should witness results quite different from those which I have presented. What would be the effect upon the country of a majority in this House hostile to the occupants of the executive offices? With this House opposed to the President and his Cabinet, and guided by the relentless bitterness which often marks partisan warfare in this country, who can calculate the disastrous consequences which might flow from such a fountain of gall? Unfortunately for us, partisan feeling and prejudice often make the embarrassment and overthrow of an Administration the objective point of all party action. In such a case no more powerful belligerent party engineery could be devised than that which this bill proposes to establish. With this power a hostile majority in this House could drive any faithful Cabinet into retirement and practically defeat the end designed to be reached by the provision of the Constitution which authorizes the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, those officers who act as his confidential advisers. No man of sufficient pride of character to entitle him to occupy a position in the Cabinet would accept an office which should subject him to the reckless partisan badgering of a hostile majority in this House. A practical absorption by this House of the independent character with which the Constitution designed to clothe the executive department, or a rupture between the two, must be the result of the system we are considering. Let such a struggle commence here and who can measure the extent of the mischief which the Republic would realize? A determined Executive and an obstinate House could soon make up an issue which would drench this land in blood. English history tells too plainly of the bitter fruits which such a rupture between two departments of the Government may produce. The experiences of England during the contest between Charles and the Parliament should admonish us to beware of measures which may cause a repetition in this Republic of the fearful tragedy which was enacted in the mother country.

Mr. Speaker, there is no safety in the experiment which we are asked to make. It is an "infernal machine" which were better left unopened and untouched. It is a dangerous departure from the theory of the Government and the established usage of the nation. I trust the House will meet it with a most emphatic and determined disapproval.

Report of the Secretary of War.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2, 1865.

SIR: I transmit herewith the report of the Secretary of War, which, with my permission, has been delayed until the present time to enable the Lieutenant General to furnish his report.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, March 1, 1865.

MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor herewith to submit the annual reports of the several bureaus of this Department. They were designed to accompany my annual report, which, by your permission, has been delayed until the Lieutenant General should furnish his summary of the military operations of the past year. His report has not yet been received, as the activity of the campaign in progress demands his unceasing attention. But the accompanying documents are now submitted, in order that, so far as can be done without injury to the service, they may be printed with the public documents of the present session of Congress.

The military events of the past year have been officially published by this Department from time to time as they transpired, and are fully known in every branch of this Government, and throughout the civilized world. They constitute a series of successful marches, sieges, and battles, attesting the endurance and courage of the soldiers of the United States, and the gallantry and military skill of their commanders, unrivaled in the history of nations.

The campaign of the army of the Potomac, and the operations on the James river, the Appomattox, and around Richmond and Petersburg; the masterly operations of our army in Georgia, resulting in the capture of Atlanta, Savannah, and other important military posts in that State; the reduction of the forts in the harbor of Mobile; the hard-fought battles at Franklin and around Nashville, resulting in the rout of the rebel army in Tennessee; the succession of brilliant victories won by the army of the Shenandoah; the successful storming of Fort Fisher; the capture of Wilmington, Columbia, and Charleston, and other achievements of less note, all contributing to the triumph of the Union cause and the suppression of the rebellion, will be more appropriately detailed upon the coming in of the report of the Lieutenant General.

That the administrative operations of the several bureaus of this Department have not failed to contribute to the success of our armies is shown by the official reports of their respective chiefs.

The Adjutant General reports the difficulties springing from a sudden and vast increase of business, measurably overcome in his bureau, clerks instructed, and work systematized. Credit is justly due to both the officers and clerks for their fidelity.

Despite superior advantages for recruiting volunteers, greater success has been reached in the regular service than was anticipated. There are two depots for collection of recruits for the Army at large, one for infantry at Fort Columbus, New York, and one for mounted service at Carlisle, Pennsylvania. There are also fourteen depots for particular regiments established in different sections of the country. Sick and wounded officers have generally been employed on recruiting service, and when recovered they have been sent to replace others in the field who require relief.

Twenty-one depots are established in the principal States for collecting and forwarding to regiments volunteers and substitutes, and also drafted men. The Veteran Reserve corps has been of much service in guarding these depots and escorting detachments to their regiments. There are also six special depots for recruits enlisted in rebel States by agents from loyal States.

Boards of examination have been kept up to inquire into causes of absence from duty and alleged offenses by officers. The effect has been to diminish the number of cases published and referred to the boards to three hundred and sixty-four for eleven months; whereas, before their organization, from one hundred to two hundred were reported monthly for absence without leave alone.

The status of chaplains seems to be misunderstood. From the wording of the act of April 9, 1864, section one, it is thought by some chaplains that a new rank between the grades of major and captain is intended for them. This is supposed to be an error growing out of the use of the term "surgeon," in the act, instead of "medical officer." The former assimilated rank of chaplains, in reference to allowance of quarters and pay proper, was "captain," and such should now be their rank.

Over two hundred flags captured from the rebels have been received, properly labeled, and deposited for safe-keeping.

Medals of honor have been awarded in numerous instances to privates and non-commissioned officers for gallant services. The plan of awarding gold and silver medals to officers instead of brevets, to a certain extent, is commended to notice. It should not supersede the conferring of brevet, especially in cases where such rank might be exercised in high commands.

The work of preparing official reports of battles, &c., for printing, in compliance with the resolution of Congress of May 19, 1864, is progressing as rapidly as possible, and all officers from whom such reports are due have been called upon for them.

The Paymaster General reports that the entire Army is paid to August 31, 1864, or in process of pay as rapidly as the Treasury can supply funds.

He calls attention to the defective organization of his bureau, and strongly urges that the Paymaster General have the rank of a brigadier general; that there be two assistant paymaster generals, with the rank of colonel, and ten deputy paymaster generals, in addition to the two now provided by law, with the rank of lieutenant colonel. He also recommends the adoption of a provision of law to the effect that any paymaster or additional paymaster selected by the Secretary of War to take charge of a geographical pay district, shall have the temporary rank of lieutenant colonel during such charge.

He also reports that the clerical force of his bureau is efficient, and that no increase is believed to be at present required.

The Chief of Ordnance reports that the fiscal affairs of that bureau show a

Balance 1st July, 1864, of.....	$3,122,979 11
Appropriations.....	42,015,000 00
Miscellaneous receipts.....	141,023 01

Total means.....$45,279,002 12

Expenditures during the year.....	$38,502,822 99

Amount of appropriations remaining in Treasury same date.....	4,978,791 87
	$45,279,002 12

The estimates for the next fiscal year are based on expenditures for a similar period last year, taking into consideration remaining balances and supplies on hand.

The supplies produced during the past fiscal year include 1,750 pieces of ordnance, 2,361 artillery carriages and caissons, 802,525 small-arms, 794,055 sets of accoutrements and harness, 1,674,244 projectiles for cannon, 12,740,146 pounds of bullets and lead, 8,409,400 pounds of gunpowder, 169,490,029 cartridges for small-arms. These are complete articles, in addition to large quantities of the same kind of supplies partially made up at the arsenals.

The ordnance supplies furnished to the military service during the fiscal year include 1,141 pieces of ordnance, 1,896 artillery carriages and caissons, 455,910 small-arms, 502,044 sets of accoutrements and harness, 1,913,753 projectiles for cannon, 7,624,685 pounds of bullets and lead, 464,549 rounds of artillery ammunition, 152,067 sets of horse equipments, 112,087,553 cartridges for small-arms, 7,544,044 pounds of gunpowder. These supplies were in addition to large quantities of parts provided for repairs in the field.

The capacity of the arsenals for the manufacture of munitions of war has been increased during the year, and that increase is still going on, so far as the means appropriated will admit. Supplies manufactured at the arsenals are of better quality and less cost than similar articles obtained by contract or purchase.

The national armory at Springfield, Massachusetts, can turn out three hundred thousand of the best quality of rifle muskets annually.

Possession has been taken of Rock Island, Illinois, in pursuance of an act of Congress, and the requisite buildings for an arsenal there are in progress.

There is on hand a stock of three quarters of a million of first-class rifle small-arms, exclusive of the arms in the hands of the troops, since increased to a million and a quarter.

The introduction of breech-loading arms for the military service generally is recommended.

The selection of a site for a general depository of gunpowder, and the erection of suitable magazines thereon, is recommended. In that connection, the construction of a Government powder-mill, of sufficient capacity to make standard and proof powder and gun-cotton, is also recommended.

The procurement of a suitable ground for the proof and experimental firing of ordnance and small-arms is urgently advised as a most essential want of the military service.

A heavy twenty-inch gun has been successfully cast and finished, and is ready for trial. The object of the trial is to demonstrate whether the destructive effects of such a gun, warranted by theory, will be practically realized, and to settle the question of the largest effective caliber for sea-coast cannon.

The armies in the field have been amply supplied with good and effective arms, equipment, and ammunition, and the armament of our fortifications has been kept in good order, and strengthened, during the year.

The Chief Engineer reports that the operations of his bureau for the last year embrace special efforts to prepare the coast defenses to receive the heavier and most suitable artillery for combating iron-clad vessels; the construction of field-works and lines with the armies in the field; the preparation and service of pontoon-bridge equipage, and the reduction of the enemy's works on Morris Island, at Fort Morgan, and Fort Gaines, by siege operations.

Much information, in campaign maps and other forms, has been prepared and disseminated, the survey of the lakes has been satisfactorily continued, and progress made in the repairs and preservation of harbor-works for which appropriations were made at the last session of Congress.

The expenditures of the year, including the maintenance of the Military Academy, amount to $6,345,191 74.

A board of engineers, ordered by the War Department in January, 1864, to examine the system of our sea-coast defenses, has performed its duties, recommending the modifications made necessary in them by the introduction of increased calibers and rifle guns, and to enable them to combat effectively iron-clad hostile fleets. Earth as a material for parapets and ramparts is now (as it has been from the earliest employment of battering artillery) found to be the best as well as the most economical resisting mass to oppose to an enemy's fire, both on the land and sea fronts. This material is uniformly adhered to wherever the locality permits.

Nine officers of engineers, out of a total number of eighty-six, have been lost during the year by death; all of them have given their lives to the service of the country.

During the year twenty-seven cadets completed the course of studies and practice in the Military Academy, and were commissioned in the Army. The smallness of this number grows out of the resignations which occurred in this class in the beginning of the rebellion. The classes at this time have the usual strength corresponding to congressional representation.

The Commissary General of Subsistence reports that the supplies of subsistence stores have been mostly purchased in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Cincinnati, Louisville, Chicago, and St. Louis. Beef cattle were furnished by contracts of short duration at most convenient places, and driven from the place of purchase to the field. Most of the stores were purchased by advertising, accepting the lowest bids offered for suitable articles at cash prices. Attempts have in some cases been made by individuals and associations to monopolize and control the prices of articles required by the Subsistence Bureau, thereby creating much difficulty.

The armies have been supplied with good and wholesome food, and large numbers of prisoners and suffering Union families have been furnished with subsistence. Generally the contractors and others have faithfully complied with their obligations. Officers employed in this branch of the service, with but few exceptions, have performed their duties with promptness in the field and at depots. During the year ending June 30, 1864, 52,482 quarterly or monthly accounts have been examined and referred to the Treasury Department.

The report of the Quartermaster General contains a statement of the operations and expenditures of the bureau under his control during the fiscal year.

The clerical force authorized by law is, in his opinion, still insufficient to make that prompt examination of accounts and reports of disbursing officers desirable, and indeed necessary, to secure rigid accountability for the expenditure of the public money and property.

An extension of the increase of compensation granted by the last Congress to clerks of the lower grades, so as to include those of higher grades, is recommended by the Quartermaster General in view of the increased cost of living in Washington.

The Quartermaster General gives an account of the measures adopted under the orders of the Secretary of War for equipping, supplying, and moving the large army which, concentrating last November on the banks of the Tennessee, fought under General Grant the battle of Chattanooga, and opened the way for the victorious campaign of the army under General Sherman, resulting in the capture of Atlanta and the operations which are now in progress in the State of Georgia. The vast efforts made, the wonderful resources in men and material developed, the manner in which the steamboat and railroad interests, the agricultural and mechanical products of the valley of the Mississippi, were laid under contribution in feeding, supplying, and moving a vast army in an advance of over three hundred miles from its secondary and four hundred and fifty miles from its primitive base, are described. The record is one creditable to the people who have developed such vast resources and placed them so patriotically at the disposal of the Government, and also to the officers, their agents in this great work.

The report gives tables of the quantities of the principal military supplies, fuel, forage, clothing, and materials purchased, transported, and used during the year. It also contains statements of the steamboats employed upon the western rivers, and of the steamers and other vessels upon the ocean, engaged in the transportation of troops and supplies.

In this service it is believed many abuses have been reformed and great economies have been effected during the past year. The indications derived from congressional examination and reports have been followed up with advantage to the service.

The Army has been well supplied with all the essentials of military equipment, and with fuel, forage, and all necessities.

The losses by capture and destruction of trains, by the burning of transports by incendiaries employed by the rebels, have been great; but the movements of the armies have seldom been delayed by them.

The most severe losses of material during the year have been the destruction of a portion of the train of the army at Chattanooga in the fall of 1863, and the consequent destruction of animals there and in East Tennessee, the destruction of steamers on the Mississippi and Ohio by incendiaries; the loss of the trains during the Red river expedition; and to these may be added the destruction of a train of two hundred wagons near Fort Smith, in Arkansas, since the close of the fiscal year.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report of the Secretary of War.

SENATE & HO. OF REPS.

As the rebel armies are beaten back, they burn all important railroad bridges, tear up the railroad tracks, destroy the water stations, carry off the machinery and rolling stock, and do all that is in their power to render the railroads useless to our armies.

The armies are obliged to follow generally the natural lines of transport and communication, and the lines by which the enemy retires. All the railroads north of the Potomac, and of the Tennessee and Cumberland, and within the territory which our armies have penetrated, have been alternately in the hands of the rebels and of our own troops. When abandoned by the enemy, their immediate reconstruction and operation becomes a military necessity.

Colonel (now Brevet Brigadier General) D. C. McCollum has been placed as military director in charge of this work. He has organized an efficient construction corps, provided rolling stock for which it was necessary to make onerous demands upon the manufacturers of the loyal States. The report of Colonel McCollum is a record of the expenditure of over eleven millions of the appropriations of the quartermaster's department. It gives information upon the means and the cost of supplying an army by railroad, and the manner of repairing and reconstructing railroads in a hostile country, which is of great interest to soldiers and engineers. The results are remarkable triumphs of military and engineering skill, creditable to the system under which they have been accomplished, to the officers and men engaged in the work, and to the country which has displayed such energy and such resources in defending and asserting its integrity. Already a thousand miles of railroad have been operated by this department, in connection with the movements of the armies.

The mobility of the armies has increased. The opinion held by some officers of rank in the early history of the rebellion, that an army could not be maintained except within reach of a navigable river or railroad, has been dispersed by such marches as those of General Sherman, from Vicksburg, east of Meridian, and back to Vicksburg, from Memphis to Knoxville and back to Decatur, at a time when the railroads were not in operation; that of General Burnside, from Cincinnati and Louisville, through southeast Kentucky, to Knoxville; and that of Lieutenant General Grant from Washington to Petersburg, and the march of General Sherman from Atlanta toward the coast.

The organization of this bureau has been much improved by the law of the 4th of July last. The grades of rank and authority being now in proportion to the duties and responsibilities, the officers work with greater success. The present organization is fully detailed in the report of the Quartermaster General, and no further changes are thought necessary.

The agreement made by the War Department with a convention of railroad companies held in this city early in the war has remained in force. The railroads have continued to do the work of the Government at the prices then established, except as modified by the internal revenue laws, though below those then charged to private citizens, which have since been considerably increased.

To a few railroads, subject to depredations by the enemy from their being in districts where the Department has not been able to give them entire protection and safety, some advance in rate has been granted.

The telegraph has continued to be a most efficient and valuable aid to military operations. Six thousand five hundred miles of military telegraph has been in operation, of which three thousand miles have been constructed during the year. About one thousand persons have been employed in this work. The efficiency and fidelity of the officers and operatives of the military telegraph deserve special recognition.

Full reports are given of the quantities of clothing, camp and garrison equipage furnished to the armies during the year. No difficulty has been found in procuring ample supplies of good quality from domestic manufacturers, with the exception of tents and blankets. In a portion of these imported materials have been used, as the domestic manufactories have not yet been able to supply all that were needed. Some frauds have been committed, the authors of which it is believed will be brought to justice by measures now in progress. Some have already been convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary.

The vast supplies of forage needed for our armies have been furnished generally with regularity. The difficulty of transporting so bulky an article as hay has caused some irregularity in its supply to armies in hostile districts, and it is remarked in this connection that the armies in actual movement draw less heavily upon the means of the Department than those which rest long inactive in districts exhausted of supplies, and therefore drawing every necessary from the distant loyal territory.

The trains of the Army are reported to be in good condition, thoroughly organized, movable, perfect in material and equipment, and well supplied with animals, and the means of repair.

The purchase of horses for the cavalry was, during the fiscal year, under the direction of a branch of the Quartermaster General's office organized especially for that purpose, in connection with the Cavalry Bureau. Since the reorganization of this office under the law of July 4, 1864, the purchase of all horses and mules for cavalry, artillery, and the trains, has been placed under the charge of a single division of the Quartermaster General's office. It is believed that this has resulted in advantage to the service by securing more direct and speedy responsibility, and a better and more uniform inspection.

The supply of animals has been at the rate of about five hundred per day, which is also the average rate of their destruction. The cavalry of the army of the Potomac was twice remounted during the first eight months of the present year.

The production of the country seems to be able to bear the immense drain upon its horses and mules, and the stock, judging from the current prices, gives no signs of exhaustion or diminution.

The quartermasters' trains of our armies average one wagon to every twenty-four men in the field; and an army in the field, well equipped with artillery, cavalry, and trains, requires one horse or mule, on the average, to every two men. The number of horses and mules is nearly equal.

The ground appropriated for a cemetery near the "Soldiers' Home," in the District, having been filled, a national military cemetery has been established at Arlington, on the south bank of the Potomac, in which several thousand interments have already been made. The names of the soldiers here buried are registered. Those who fell repelling the rebel attack on the capital last July have been buried on the battle-field north of Fort Stevens. It is recommended that Congress provide for the erection of a monument to them.

For the better protection of the depots of the Quartermaster's Bureau from rebel raids, the Quartermaster General was directed to cause the persons employed in his department, at the principal and exposed depots, to be organized into military companies and regiments for internal guard duty and for local defense.

This organization at Washington, Nashville, and Louisville has brought into service, as an aid to the regular troops, a force of several thousand men. They have, both in this District and in Tennessee, been called upon several times during the last year to take the place of regular troops on guard and in the trenches, and have done good service at Washington, Nashville, and Johnsonville, all of which depots have been threatened or attacked by the rebel armies.

The Quartermaster General states that the views expressed in his report of 1862, in regard to the aid to be expected and derived from the colored population, have been confirmed by two years' experience. These persons have been extensively employed in the labors of the Quartermaster General's bureau, where each one so employed released a white soldier from labor, and restores him to his place in line of battle. Their extensive enlistment has created a demand, however, beyond the supply; application being made to the Quartermaster General for such labor with the armies before Richmond, which he was unable to provide, he endeavored to procure colored men from the departments of the Atlantic and Gulf coast, where it was publicly reported that they were suffering for want of employment. None could be obtained from those departments, however. The commander of one of them reported that they were all wanted for labor necessary to the success of military operations, or for other public service, and that not a man, woman, or child could be spared.

The Quartermaster General makes honorable mention of the labors and services of some of the officers of his bureau, who have been engaged in the most important operations, and have most contributed to the general success of our armies.

Reference is made to the danger of interruption of our military communications with the States on the Pacific coast by war, and the difficulty of supplying armies and defending these portions of the Republic, when the only military communication not exposed to a hostile fleet is a wagon road across the continent, is mentioned. The early completion of the Pacific railroad is called for as a military precaution, deserving attention and the fostering care of the Government.

It appears from the report of the Surgeon General that the funds derived from all sources, and available for the expenses of the medical department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, were $12,263,988 08.

Disbursements.....	$11,025,791 33
Balance remaining in the Treasury June 30, 1864.....	914,135 10
Balance in the hands of disbursing officers.....	324,061 65
	$12,263,988 08

One hundred and eighty-two hospitals, with a capacity of 84,472 beds, were in operation at the date of the last annual report. During the summer campaign it was found necessary to establish additional ones, and increase the capacity of those nearest the scenes of active operations, giving 190 hospitals, with a capacity of 120,521 beds on June 30, 1864. During the year the health of the entire Army was better than is usual with troops engaged so constantly on active duty and in arduous campaigns. No destructive epidemics prevailed in any section, and the number of sick and wounded, although large, has been comparatively small in the proportion it bore to the whole Army. At the close of the year the number of sick and wounded, both with their commands and in general hospitals, was less than sixteen per cent. of the strength of the Army. The number sick with their respective commands was four per cent., and in general hospitals five and three tenths per cent., of the strength. Of the six and forty-six hundredths per cent. wounded, nearly one per cent. were with their respective commands, the rest in general hospitals.

The establishment of medical depots within reach of armies in the field, and their prompt supply upon the field of battle; the transportation of sick and wounded by ambulance, railroad, and hospital transports; the sufficiency and successful administration of the best system of general hospitals, the sanitary precautions, as well as all minor details of this department, tending to the greater comfort of the sick and wounded, as well as to the health and efficiency of the troops, have, during the year, undergone the severest possible test, and in no instance have the movements of successful generals been impeded or delayed from any cause within the control of the medical department.

House bill No. 543, Thirty-Eighth Congress, having passed the House of Representatives, was not reached in the Senate, and awaits final action. The proposed and well-deserved promotion of meritorious medical officers cannot fail to increase their efficiency, by placing them upon an equal footing with those of other staff corps in regard to local rank, and it is respectfully submitted that the faithful performance of arduous duties by officers of the medical staff should be recognized and rewarded by brevets equally with the other branches of the service.

The Army Medical Museum continues to increase in value, and is already one of the most instructive pathological collections in the world. A descriptive catalogue is in course of preparation, an examination of which will, it is thought, fully establish the importance of this institution in connection with the surgical and medical history of the war.

From the report of the Provost Marshal General will be seen—

1. The efforts made during the year to perfect the enrollment of the national forces, the lists on the 1st of November last containing the names of 2,784,226 men.

2. The results of the drafts made in 1863 and 1864, given in tabular form, from which it appears that on the 31st day of July last there was no material deficiency in the United States on the quotas of troops required, such localities as were behind having been drafted for the amounts due from them. The draft made under the call of July 18, 1864, was in progress at the date of the Provost Marshal General's report. This draft came on during the heat of the late presidential campaign, and resistance to it was threatened in many places, and in some actually organized. The Provost Marshal General justly claims special credit for the officers acting under him for the firmness and fairness with which they executed the law of Congress and the orders of the Government in making this draft, and for the success which attended their efforts.

3. The results of the volunteer recruiting service, under the different calls for troops, dated February 1, March 14, and July 18, 1864, are given. In reference to the reenlistment of veteran volunteers during the fall of 1863 the Provost Marshal General says:

"Over a hundred and thirty-six thousand tried soldiers, who would otherwise ere this have been discharged, were secured for three years longer. Organizations which would have been lost to the service were preserved and recruited, and capable and experienced officers were retained in command. The force thus organized and retained has performed an essential part in the great campaign of 1864, and its importance to the country cannot be overestimated."

I concur in the forgoing remarks, and know of no operation connected with the recruitment of the Army which has resulted in more advantage to the service than the one referred to.

The results of the recruitment under the act of July 4, 1864, for recruiting in rebel States are reported as unfavorable.

4. Commutation money received up to November 1, 1864, from drafted men, while permitted by law to secure exemption by payment of $300 each is appropriated by act of Congress, "for the expenses of draft, and for the procurement of substitutes." A large part of it has been used, and the remainder is required for other purposes.

5. The Provost Marshal General reports activity on the part of his officers in the arrest of deserters and stragglers, 39,392 having been arrested between October 1, 1863, and October 1, 1864—the total number arrested, from the establishment of the bureau to October 1, 1864, being 60,760.

6. The Provost Marshal General reports the Veteran Reserve corps as consisting, October 1, 1864, of 764 officers and 28,738 men; its discipline and instruction good; and that the entire corps is doing duty which would otherwise have to be performed by an equal number of able-bodied troops detached from the armies in the field; and that it is yet inadequate in numbers to fill the demands made on it.

7. The medical statistics of the drafts, presented in a series of tables, are referred to by the Provost Marshal General as worthy of special attention.

8. The total disbursements on account of enrollment and draft, including all the expenses of the bureau for the year ending October 31, 1864, are given at $4,016,728 55. The amount expended during the year ending September 30, 1864, from the appropriation for collecting, organizing, and drilling volunteers, is given at $4,199,071 17. Amount expended from same fund during preceding year, $7,789,237 40. Amount expended during the year ending September 30, 1864, for pay of advance bounty to volunteers, $14,658,203.

No appropriation of money is asked for any branch of this bureau during the ensuing year.

As will appear from the accompanying report of the Judge Advocate General, the business of this bureau has continued steadily to increase. Its important duties are believed to be faithfully performed, while, as was anticipated, the new organization given to the office by the act of last session is found to have added much to the efficiency of its operations. A digest of the opinions of the Judge Advocate General upon current questions of military law, which has been published and distributed throughout the Army, will, while affording valuable instruction to inexperienced officers, contribute to produce that uniformity of decision and action so much to be desired in the administration of military justice.

The general exchange of prisoners effected under the instructions of this Department by Lieutenant General Grant is in course of diligent execution, and it is hoped that all of our prisoners who are in the hands of the rebels will soon be returned. A furlough of thirty days is extended to them as they are returned to the camp at Annapolis.

To the chiefs of bureaus and their subordinates the thanks of this Department are due for their unwearied industry, vigilance, and general fidelity in the discharge of their respective duties.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

CHAPTER I.—An Act in addition to the "Act respecting Quarantines and Health Laws," approved February twenty-fifth, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and for the better execution of the third section thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase or erect suitable warehouses and other conveniences for the storage of goods and merchandise imported in any vessel subject to quarantine or other restraint, pursuant to the health laws of the State of New York, at such convenient place or places within or near the port of New York as the safety of the public revenue and the observance of such health laws may require; and the sum of twenty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense thereof.

APPROVED, December 15, 1864.

CHAP. II.—An Act authorizing the holding of a Special Session of the United States District Court for the District of Indiana.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana shall be holden at the usual place of holding said court, on the first Tuesday in January, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all suits and proceedings of a civil or criminal nature, now pending in or returnable to said court, shall be proceeded in, heard, tried, and determined by said court, at said special session, in the same manner as at a regular term of said court, and the judge thereof is hereby empowered to order the impanneling of a petit and grand jury for said session.

APPROVED, December 20, 1864.

CHAP. III.—An Act to authorize the Purchase or Construction of Revenue Cutters on the Lakes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to construct, or purchase and alter, not exceeding six steam revenue cutters, for service on the lakes; and for that purpose the sum of one million of dollars, or so much thereof as is necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

APPROVED, December 20, 1864.

CHAP. VI.—An Act to establish the Grade of Vice Admiral in the United States Navy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one vice admiral, who shall be selected from the list of active rear admirals, and who shall be the ranking officer in the Navy of the United States, and whose relative rank with officers of the Army shall be that of lieutenant general in the Army.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the pay of the vice admiral of the Navy shall be seven thousand dollars when at sea, six thousand dollars when on shore duty, and five thousand dollars when waiting orders.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the first section of an act, approved December twenty-first, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, entitled "An act further to promote the efficiency of the Navy," shall not be so construed as to apply to any one holding a commission as vice admiral in the Navy.

APPROVED, December 21, 1864.

CHAP. VIII.—An Act to amend the act entitled "An Act to provide Internal Revenue to support the Government, to pay Interest on the Public Debt, and for other purposes," approved Junethirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section fifty-five of an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be amended by striking out the word "February" wherever it occurs in said section, and inserting, in lieu thereof, the word January.

APPROVED, December 22, 1864.

CHAP. IX.—An Act to extend the Time allowed for the Withdrawal of certain Goods therein named from public Stores.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in computing the three years allowed by the twenty-first section of the act entitled "An act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, for the withdrawal of goods from any public store or bonded warehouse for exportation to foreign countries, or transshipment to any port of the Pacific or western coast of the United States, if such exportation or transshipment of any such goods shall, either for the whole or any part of the said term of three years have been prevented by reason of any order of the President of the United States, the time during which such exportation or transshipment of such goods shall have been so prevented, as aforesaid, shall be excluded from the said computation.

APPROVED, December 22, 1864.

CHAP. XI.—An Act to repeal the Provision of Law requiring certain Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to be members of the National Institute.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the act "To establish the Smithsonian Institution, for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men" as requires that two of the regents of said Institution shall be members of the National Institute in the city of Washington, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, January 10, 1865.

CHAP. XII.—An Act making Appropriations for the Payment of Invalid and other Pensions of the United States for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-six:

For invalid pensions under various acts, four million dollars.

For revolutionary pensions, per acts of March eighteenth, eighteen hundred and eighteen; May fifteenth, eighteen hundred and twenty-eight; June seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty-two; third section of act of July seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight; March third, eighteen hundred and forty-three; June seventeenth, eighteen hundred and forty-four; February second and

Laws of the United States.

July twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and forty-eight; and second section [of] act of February third, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, two hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

For pensions to widows, mothers, children, and sisters, under the first section of the act of fourth July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six; act of July twenty-first, eighteen hundred and forty-eight; first section of the act of February third, eighteen hundred and fifty-three; June third, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight; and July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, seven million dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the present fiscal year: for the payment of pensions under the acts of March eighteenth, eighteen hundred and eighteen; May fifteenth, eighteen hundred and twenty-eight; June seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty-two; third section of act of July fourth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six; July seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight; January [June] seventeenth, eighteen hundred and forty-four; March third, eighteen hundred and forty-three; February second and July twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and forty-eight; and second section of act of February third, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, sixty-five thousand dollars.

For the payment of pensions under the first section of the act of July fourth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six; act of July twenty-first, eighteen hundred and forty-eight; first section of the act of February third, eighteen hundred and fifty-three; June third, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight; and July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, three million five hundred thousand dollars.

APPROVED, January 11, 1865.

CHAP. XIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act for the Punishment of Crimes in the District of Columbia," approved March second, eighteen hundred and thirty-one.

APPROVED, January 13, 1865.

CHAP. XVI.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to provide for carrying the Mails from the United States to Foreign Ports, and for other purposes," approved March twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the fourth section of an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be so amended as to insert in the proviso in said section, after the word "newspapers," the words "periodicals, magazines, and exchanges," so that it will read: Provided, That this section shall not be held to extend to the transmission by mail of newspapers, periodicals, magazines, and exchanges, from a known office of publication to bona fide subscribers, not exceeding one copy to each subscriber from any one office.

APPROVED, January 20, 1865.

CHAP. XVIII.—An Act making Appropriations for the Consular and Diplomatic Expenses of the Government for the year ending thirtieth June, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, namely:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary, ministers, and commissioners of the United States at Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Spain, Austria, Brazil, Republic of Mexico, China, Italy, Chili, Peru, Portugal, Switzerland, Rome, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Turkey, New Granada, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Sandwich Islands, Costa Rica, Honduras, Argentine Confederation, Paraguay, Japan, and Salvador, three hundred and eight thousand five hundred dollars.

For salaries of secretaries of legation, thirty thousand dollars.

For salaries of assistant secretaries of legation at London and Paris, three thousand dollars.

For salary of the interpreter to the legation to China, five thousand dollars.

For salary of the secretary of legation to Turkey, acting as interpreter, three thousand dollars.

For salary of the interpreter to the legation to Japan, two thousand five hundred dollars.

For contingent expenses of all the missions abroad, sixty thousand dollars.

For contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, eighty thousand dollars.

For expenses of intercourse with the Barbary Powers, three thousand dollars.

For expenses of the consulates in the Turkish dominions, namely: interpreters, guards, and other expenses of the consulates at Constantinople, Smyrna, Candia, Alexandria, and Beirut, two thousand five hundred dollars.

For the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, two hundred thousand dollars.

For expenses which may be incurred in acknowledging the services of the masters and crews of foreign vessels in rescuing citizens of the United States from shipwreck, seven thousand dollars.

For the purchase of blank-books, stationery, book-cases, arms of the United States, seals, presses, and flags, and for the payment of postages and miscellaneous expenses of the consuls of the United States, including loss by exchange, fifty-five thousand dollars.

For office rent for those consuls general, consuls, and commercial agents who are not allowed to trade, including loss by exchange thereon, fifty thousand dollars.

For salaries of consuls general, consuls, commercial agents, and thirteen consular clerks, namely:

APPROVED, January 28, 1865.

CHAP. XXIV.—An Act to amend the Charter of the "Washington Gas-Light Company."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the acts of June twenty-five, eighteen hundred and sixty, and July eleven, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, as relate to the price of gas furnished by the "Washington Gas-Light Company," be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the act incorporating the "Washington Gas-Light Company" is hereby so amended as to prohibit the said company from receiving, on and after the first day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, for the benefit of its stockholders, a greater price for gas than forty cents per hundred cubic feet, subject to a discount of ten per centum on all bills for gas furnished to the General Government, and five per centum on all bills for gas furnished to other consumers, if paid at the office of the company within seven days from the rendition thereof.

APPROVED, January 30, 1865.

CHAP. XXV.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia," approved July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section seventeen of the act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia, approved July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to extend the time for the completion of their railroad line, except that part thereof between Seventeenth street and the Capitol, for one year from the passage of this act: Provided, however, That the line from Seventeenth street and the Capitol be completed, equipped, and running, within thirty days from the passage of this act.

APPROVED, January 30, 1865.

CHAP. XXVI.—An Act to amend the Act entitled "An Act to amend and extend the Charter of the Franklin Insurance Company," approved second March, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight.

acquired, and all legal obligations entered into by said company between the ninth day of April, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, and the date of this act be, and the same are hereby, made valid for all legal purposes.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Franklin Insurance Company are hereby authorized to increase their capital stock to an amount not exceeding two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

APPROVED, January 30, 1865.

CHAP. XXIX.—An Act for the Relief of certain Friendly Indians of the Sioux Nation, in Minnesota.

Whereas certain Indians of the Sioux nation did, during the outbreak in Minnesota in eighteen hundred and sixty-two, at the risk of their lives, aid in saving many white men, women, and children from being massacred, and, in consequence of such action, were compelled to abandon their homes and property, and are now entirely destitute of the means of support: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and requested to cause an examination to be made in relation to all the facts pertaining to the action of the said Indians, and to make such provision for their welfare as their necessities and future protection may require.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; one third of said sum to be paid and expended for the benefit of Am-pe-tu-to-ke-cha, or John Other-day, and the remainder for the benefit of such other Indians as shall appear specially entitled thereto, for their friendly, extraordinary, and gallant services in rescuing white settlers from massacre in Minnesota: Provided, That not more than the sum of five hundred dollars shall be expended for any one Indian, except the chief above mentioned; and that the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the next Congress the names of the Indians for whose benefit the same shall be expended, and the amount expended for each.

APPROVED, February 9, 1865.

CHAP. XXX.—An Act to extend to certain Persons in the Employ of the Government, the Benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That during the continuance of the rebellion, civilians employed in the service of the United States in the quartermaster's department and subsistence department of the Army, who may be, or may hereafter become insane while in such employment, shall be admitted, on the order of the Secretary of War, the same as persons belonging to the Army and Navy, to the benefits of the asylum for the insane in the District of Columbia, as provided in such other cases by the fourth section of the "Act to organize an institution for the insane of the Army and Navy, and of the District of Columbia in the said District," approved March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-five.

APPROVED, February 9, 1865.

CHAP. XXXII.—An Act to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers or Depositaries of the United States in certain cases.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of any Assistant Treasurer or depositary of the United States from his office, he may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such Assistant Treasurer or depositary: Provided, That the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases: And provided further, That such acting officer shall, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct, in like cases, of the Assistant Treasurer or depository respectively for whom he shall act.

APPROVED, February 13, 1865.

CHAP. XXXIV.—An Act to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That James Harper, Thomas Patton, C. H. Moody, John W. Magill, John M. Reilly, B. F. Gay, Valentine Blanchard, Thomas J. Fisher, Hudson Taylor, Augustus F. Perry, D. Walker, James Montgomery, Joseph J. May, or any five of them, be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to receive subscriptions to the capital stock of a company to be denominated "The National Union Insurance Company of Washington," who shall open a book for that purpose in the city of Washington, at the time and place to be by them designated, of which they shall give ten days' notice in two or more of the daily papers of said city, and shall keep the same open until twenty thousand shares of fifty dollars a share each shall have been subscribed; and any person of lawful age, and a citizen of the United States, shall be permitted to subscribe upon paying five dollars on each share at the time of subscribing. And it shall be lawful for the said corporation to have a common seal, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and have and exercise all the rights, privileges, and immunities for the purposes of the corporation hereby created.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the affairs of the company shall be managed by nine directors, to be elected annually by ballot on the second Monday of July by the stockholders or by their legally empowered agents, and each share of stock shall entitle the holder thereof to one vote; the election to be held at the office of the company at a general meeting of the stockholders convened for that purpose, by ten days' public notice in two or more of the daily papers of the city of Washington: Provided, That the first election for directors shall be held pursuant to ten days' notice given in one or more of the daily papers of the city of Washington by the persons named in the first section of this act, or any five of them, who shall designate the time when and the place where said election shall be held; and the stockholders shall then and there elect nine directors to serve until the next ensuing election as provided for in this act. And at the first ensuing meeting of the directors after every election, they shall appoint one of their number as president, who, together with themselves, shall hold office until the next ensuing election as herein provided for; and five members of said board shall compose a quorum. And in case that an election for directors should not be made when pursuant to this act it should have been made, the company for that cause shall not be dissolved; and it shall be lawful, within forty days thereafter, to hold and make an election for directors in such manner as the by-laws of the company may prescribe, and the president and directors for the time being shall be continued in office, until such election take place. And in the event of death, resignation, or removal of any director from office, his place for the remainder of his term may be filled by the president and directors for the time being, in such manner as the by-laws may prescribe.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have power to appoint a secretary and such other officers, agents, and clerks as may to them appear proper, to fix their compensation and pay the same.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock shall be called in, and paid in such installments and proportions, and at such times and place, as the president and directors for the time being may require and designate, who shall give fifteen days' notice thereof in two or more daily papers of the city of Washington. And if any stockholder, subscriber, their assignee or trans-ferree, shall refuse or neglect to pay such proportion or installment, at the time and place appointed, such stockholder, subscriber, transferee, or assignee shall, at the option of the president and directors, forfeit to the use of the company all his, her, or their right, title, and interest in and to every share on which such installment has not been duly made; and fresh subscriptions may be opened for the same, in such manner as the by-laws may prescribe, or the president and directors may, at their option, commence suit for the same and recover against the holder of said stock for the amount of the installment or proportion so unpaid: Provided, That no stockholder or subscriber shall be permitted to vote at any election for directors, or at any general or special meeting of the company, on whose shares any installments or arrearages may be due more than fifteen days previous thereto.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors for the time being shall have power to ordain, establish, and put in execution such rules, regulations, ordinances, and by-laws as they may deem essential for the well government of the institution, not contrary to the laws and Constitution of the United States, or of this act, and generally to do and perform all acts, matters, and things which a corporation may or can lawfully do.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors are hereby empowered and fully authorized, on behalf of the company, to make insurance against losses by fire on any house, building, tenement, manufactories, mills, or other buildings; on goods, wares, chattels, and effects of all kinds therein, or otherwise; upon grain, produce, and implements, and upon vessels building on the stocks, in port or at moorings; and, generally, upon all and every sort and description of property, of whatever kind soever, on land or water; and to make, execute, perfect, and conclude so many contracts, bargains, agreements, policies, and other instruments as the nature of the case shall or may require; and all such instruments, bargains, contracts, policies, or agreements shall be in print or in writing, and shall be signed by the president and secretary, or such other persons as the managers may appoint for such purpose, and shall be under the seal of the company: Provided, That said president and directors may, at their option and discretion, make insurance on such terms and conditions as to them may appear equitable, reserving the premiums, or appropriating and returning such portions thereof to the insured as may to them appear conducive to the interest of the company and the insured, in such manner and on such conditions as may appear to them just and proper.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall, on the third Monday in June of each and every year, divide so much of the profits of said company as to them may appear advisable, first deducting all expenses, and pay the same to the respective stockholders or their agents, duly empowered, in ten days thereafter; but the money received as premiums upon risks which remain outstanding and undetermined at the time of declaring such dividend, shall not then be considered as part of the profits; and if the capital stock paid in shall be lessened by losses, no subsequent dividend shall be made or declared until a sum equal to said diminution shall have been added to the capital stock.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the stock of said company shall be transferred on the books of the company in such manner only as the by-laws of the company shall direct.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed as making it perpetual, but Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal the same.

APPROVED, February 14, 1865.

CHAP. XXXV.—An Act for the Relief of Collectors and Surveyors of the Customs in certain cases.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases in which any collector or surveyor of the customs has paid or accounted for, or is charged with duties accruing under the "Joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and in which the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the collection of the said duties was omitted by such collector or surveyor, for the reason that he was not informed of the passage of said resolution when said duties accrued, the said Secretary be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such rules as he may prescribe, to remit or refund, as the case may require, such duties to such collector or surveyor.

APPROVED, February 14, 1865.

CHAP. XXXVII.—An Act to authorize the establishment of Ocean Mail Steamship Service between the United States and China.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to invite proposals by public advertisement, for the period of sixty days, in one or more newspapers published in the cities of Washington, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco, respectively, for mail steamship service between the port of San Francisco, in the United States, and some port or ports in the Chinese empire, touching at Honolulu, in the Sandwich Islands, and one or more ports in Japan, by means of a monthly line of first-class American sea-going steamships, to be of not less than three thousand tons burden each, and of sufficient number to perform twelve round trips per annum between said ports, and to contract with the lowest responsible bidder for said service for a term of not more than ten years, to commence from the day the first steamship of the proposed line shall depart from the port of San Francisco with the mails for China: Provided, That no bid shall be considered which shall amount to more than five hundred thousand dollars for the twelve round trips per annum, nor unless the same is from a citizen or citizens of the United States, and accompanied by an offer of good and sufficient sureties (also citizens of the United States) for the faithful performance of such contract.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any contract which the Postmaster General may execute, under the authority of this act, shall go into effect on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, and shall, in addition to the usual stipulations of ocean mail steamship contracts, provide that the steamships accepted for the service shall be constructed of the best material and after approved models, with all the modern improvements adapted to sea-going steamships of the first class, and shall be subject to inspection and survey by an experienced naval constructor, to be detailed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Navy, whose report shall be made to the Postmaster General. That the Government of the United States shall be entitled to have transported, free of expense, on each and every steamer, a mail agent, to take charge of and arrange the mail matter, to whom suitable accommodation for that purpose shall be assigned. That in case of failure from any cause to perform any of the regular monthly voyages stipulated for in the contract, a pro rata deduction shall be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages. That suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays and irregularities in the performance of the service, and that the Postmaster General shall have the power to determine the contract at any time in case of its being underlet or assigned to any other party.

APPROVED, February 17, 1865.

CHAP. XXXVIII.—An Act supplementary to an Act approved July fourteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, entitled "An Act to establish certain Post Roads."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act of Congress approved July fourteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, entitled "An Act to establish certain post roads," shall be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to authorize the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and the Jeffersonville Railroad Company (stockholders in the Louisville Bridge Company) to construct a railroad bridge over the Ohio river at the head of the falls of the Ohio, subject to all the provisions of said act: Provided, That the said bridge may be constructed at a height not less than fifty-six feet above low water-mark, and with three draws, sufficient to pass the largest boats navigating the Ohio river; one over the Indiana chute, one over the middle chute, and one over the canal: Provided, That the spans of said bridge shall not be less than two hundred and forty feet, except over the Indiana and middle chute and the canal; said bridge shall be constructed with draws of one hundred and fifty feet wide on each side of the pivot pier over the Indiana and middle chutes, and ninety feet wide over the canal: And provided further, That said bridge and draws shall be so constructed as not to interrupt the navigation of the Ohio river.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the bridge erected under the provisions of this act shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route.

APPROVED, February 17, 1865.

CHAP. XXXIX.—An Act to establish a Bridge across the Ohio River at Cincinnati, Ohio, a Post Road.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the bridge across the Ohio river, at Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, and at Covington, in the State of Kentucky, is hereby declared to be, when completed, in accordance with the laws of the States of Ohio and Kentucky, a lawful structure and post road for the conveyance of the mails of the United States.

APPROVED, February 17, 1865.

CHAP. XLI.—An Act authorizing the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the term of one year from the passage of this act, an officer in the War Department, to be called the Second Assistant Secretary of War, whose salary shall be three thousand dollars per annum, payable in the same manner as that of the Secretary of War, who shall perform all such duties in the office of the Secretary of War, belonging to that Department, as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or as may be required by law.

APPROVED, February 20, 1865.

CHAP. XLII.—An Act to enlarge the Port of Entry and Delivery for the District of Philadelphia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the port of entry and delivery for the district of Philadelphia shall be bounded on the river Delaware by Frankford creek, on the north, and Broad street, on the south.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts conflicting with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, February 20, 1865.

CHAP. XLIII.—An Act to repeal an Act entitled "An Act to remove the United States Arsenal from the City of Saint Louis, and to provide for the Sale of the Lands on which the same is located."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An Act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of Saint Louis, and to provide for the sale of the lands on which the same is located," approved March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, February 20, 1865.

CHAP. XLV.—An Act to extinguish the Indian Title to Lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for Agricultural and Mineral Purposes.

be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to enter into treaties with the various tribes of Indians of Utah Territory, upon such terms as may be deemed just to said Indians and beneficial to the Government of the United States: Provided, That such treaties shall provide for the absolute surrender to the United States, by said Indians, of their possessory right to all the agricultural and mineral lands in said Territory except such agricultural lands as by said treaties may be set apart for reservations for said Indians: And provided, further, That all such reservations shall be selected at points as remote as may be practicable from the present settlements in Utah Territory.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in agreeing with said Indians upon the amounts to be paid to them under the provisions of the treaties to be negotiated in pursuance of this act, care shall be taken to obtain from the Indians, to the greatest possible extent, their consent to receive for such payments agricultural implements, stock, and other useful articles, rather than money.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of negotiating said treaties and carrying out the provisions of this act, making presents to said Indians, and defraying the necessary expenses incident to such negotiation, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars.

APPROVED, February 23, 1865.

CHAP. XLVI.—An Act to provide for the Payment of the Value of certain Lands and Improvements of private Citizens, appropriated by the United States for Indian Reservations, in the Territory of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of eighteen thousand six hundred and eleven dollars and sixty-two cents, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying for the lands and improvements of private citizens, taken and appropriated, by order of the Department of the Interior, for Indian reservations and uses in the Territory of Washington; and the claims herein provided to be paid shall be allowed and paid in such manner and upon such proofs of the value of the property as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

APPROVED, February 23, 1865.

CHAP. XLVII.—An Act to facilitate the Collection of certain Debts due the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases where debts are due from postmasters, mail contractors, or other officers, agents, or employes of the Post Office Department, who are in default or delinquency, a warrant of attachment may issue against all property, real and personal, possessions, and rights legal, equitable, and contingent, belonging to such officer and his sureties, or either of them, in the following cases:

First. When any such officer, agent, or employe, and his sureties, or either of them, has, within the meaning of the act of July seventeen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, chapter one hundred and ninety-five, and the proclamation of the President in pursuance thereof, dated the twenty-fifth day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, participated in, aided, abetted, or countenanced any rebellion against the United States.

Second. When such officer, agent, or employe, and his sureties, or either of them, is a non-resident of the district where such officer was appointed, or has departed from such district for the purpose of residing permanently out of such district, or of defrauding the United States, or of avoiding the service of civil process.

Third. When such officer or his sureties, or either of them, has conveyed away or is about to convey away his property, or any part thereof, or has removed or is about to remove his property, or any part thereof, from the district wherein the same is situated, with intent to defraud the United States. And where such removal has taken place, certified copies of the warrant may be sent to the marshal of any other district into which such property may have been removed, under which certified copies it shall be lawful for such marshal to seize such property and convey it to some convenient point within the jurisdiction of the court from which the warrant originally issued. Alias warrants may issue upon due application, and the validity of the warrant first issued shall continue until the return day thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That application for such warrant may be made by any district attorney or assistant district attorney, or any other person authorized by the Postmaster General, before any judge, or, in his absence, before any clerk of any court of the United States having original jurisdiction of the cause of action. Such application shall be made upon an affidavit of the applicant, or some other credible person, stating the existence of either of the grounds of attachment enumerated in the first section of this act, and upon production of legal evidence of the debt. Upon such application, and upon due order of any judge of the court, or in the absence of any judge without such order, the clerk shall issue a warrant for the attachment of all the property of any kind belonging to the party or parties specified in the affidavit, which warrant shall be executed with all possible dispatch by the marshal, who shall take the property attached, if personal, into his custody, and hold the same subject to all interlocutory or final orders of the court.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the party or parties whose property is attached may, at any time within twenty days before the return day of the warrant, on giving to the district attorney notice of his intention, file a plea in abatement, traversing the allegations of the affidavit, or denying the ownership of the property attached in the defendants, or either of them, in which case the court may, upon application of either party, order an immediate trial by jury of the issues raised by the affidavit and plea. But the parties may, by consent, waive a trial by jury, in which case the court shall decide the issues raised by the affidavit and plea. Any party claiming ownership of the property attached and a specific return of the same shall be confined to the remedy afforded by this act, but his right to an action of trespass or other action for damages shall not be impaired hereby.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That when the property attached shall be sold on any interlocutory order of the court, or when it shall be producing any revenue, the money arising from such sale or revenue shall be invested in securities of the United States, under the order of the court, and all accretions shall be held subject to the order of the court.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That immediately upon the execution of the warrant of attachment the marshal shall cause due publication of such attachment to be made, in the case of absconding debtors or adherents of the rebellion, for two months, and in case of non-residents for four months. Such publication shall be made in some newspaper or newspapers within the district where the property attached is situated, and the details of such publication shall be regulated in each case by the order under which the warrant is issued.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That after the first publication of such notice of attachment in all the newspapers required by this or any subsequent act, every person indebted to the defendants, or either of them, and having knowledge of such notice, whose property is liable to attachment, and every person having possession of any property belonging to such defendants, or either of them, and having knowledge as aforesaid, shall account and answer for the amount of such debt and for the value of such property, and any disposal or attempt to dispose of any such property to the injury of the United States shall be illegal and void. When the person or persons so indebted to or having possession of the property of such defendants, or either of them, shall be known to the district attorney or the marshal, it shall be the duty of such officer to see that personal notice of such attachment is served upon such persons, as in cases of garnishees; but the want of such notice shall not invalidate the attachment.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That upon application of the party whose property has been attached, the court or any judge thereof may discharge the warrant of attachment as to the property of the applicant: Provided, That such applicant shall enter into and execute to the United States a good and sufficient penal bond in double the amount of the value of the property attached, conditioned for the return of said property, or to answer any judgment which may be rendered by the court in the premises, which bond shall be approved by the court or any judge thereof.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the fees, costs, and expenses of issuing and serving the warrants of attachment authorized by this act shall be regulated as far as possible by the existing laws of the United States and the rules of court made in pursuance thereof. In the case of preliminary trials as to the validity of the attachment or the right of property, clerks' and marshals' fees shall be the same as in ordinary cases, and the docket fee of the district attorney shall be ten dollars.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be construed so as to limit or abridge in any manner such rights of the United States as have accrued or been allowed in any district under the former practice of the United States courts or the adoption of State laws by said courts.

APPROVED, February 23, 1865.

CHAP. XLVIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to amend an Act to incorporate the Inhabitants of the City of Washington, passed May fifteen, eighteen hundred and twenty," approved May fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act, approved May fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An act to amend 'An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington,' passed May fifteen, eighteen hundred and twenty," be construed amended so as to read as follows: "That the said corporation shall have full power and authority to lay taxes on particular wards, parts, or sections of the city, for their particular local improvements, and to cause the curb-stones to be set, the foot and carriage ways, or so much thereof as they may deem best, to be graded and paved; to introduce the necessary sewerage and drainage facilities under and upon the whole or any portion of any avenue, street, or alley; to cause the same to be suitably paved and repaired, and at all times properly cleaned and watered; to cause lamps to be erected therein, and to light the same and to pay the cost thereof, the corporation of Washington is hereby authorized to lay and collect a tax upon all property bordering upon each street or alley that may be paved, sewerd, lighted, cleaned, or watered by said corporation in accordance with the provisions of this act. And also to lay, or cause to be laid, simultaneously with the grading or paving of any avenue, street, or alley in which a main water-pipe or main gas-pipe, or main sewer may have been laid, water or gas service pipes or lateral house drains, from such water or gas main or main sewer to one foot within the curb line in front of every lot or subdivisional part of a lot which may bound on such avenue, street, or alley, and to which a gas or water service pipe or house drain may not have been already laid, and to pay the cost thereof, shall have full power and authority to lay and collect a special tax on every such lot or subdivisional part of a lot.

APPROVED, February 23, 1865.

CHAP. XLIX.—An Act to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Isabel Atkinson, Elizabeth Medcalf, Teresa Byrne, Ellen Matthews, Mary Duffy, Teresa Moran, and Ellen Wynne, and their successors, hereafter to become Sisters of Mercy, and to be appointed according to the rules and regulations that have been or may hereafter be established by their association, be, and they are hereby, made, declared, and constituted a corporation or body-politic, in law and in fact, to have continuance forever, by the name, style, and title of the "Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia."

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all and singular the lands, houses, tenements, rents, legacies, annuities, rights, property, privileges, goods, and chattels, heretofore given, granted, devised or bequeathed to the said Sisters of Mercy, in the District of Columbia, or to any individual of the said corporation, or to any person or persons for the use of said corporation, or that have been purchased for or on account of the same be, and they are hereby, vested in, and confirmed to, the said corporation; and that the said corporation may purchase, take, receive, hold, and apply to the uses and purposes of the same, according to the rules, regulations, and by-laws that they may establish from time to time, for the management of the concerns of the said society or corporation, any lands, tenements, rents, legacies, annuities, rights, property, and privileges, or any goods, chattels, or other effects of what kind or nature soever, which shall or may have been or may hereafter be given, granted, sold, bequeathed or devised unto the said association or corporation by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, capable of making such grants, sale, or bequest, and that the said association or corporation of the Sisters of Mercy, in the District of Columbia, may dispose of and convey the same as they may deem proper: Provided, That the said association or corporation shall not, at any one time, hold, use, possess, and enjoy, within the District of Columbia, either by legal seizure, or trust, for its use and benefit, more than three hundred and twenty acres of land, nor shall the said association or corporation hold, in its own right, or by any other person in trust, or for its benefit, real estate the annual net income of which, after discharging all its expenses, debts, and liabilities, shall exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation, by the name of the Sisters of Mercy, in the District of Columbia, be, and shall be hereafter, capable in law and in equity to sue and be sued, within the District of Columbia and elsewhere, in as effectual a manner as other persons or corporations can sue or be sued, and that the said corporation, or a majority of the persons composing the same, shall adopt and use a common seal, and the same to use, alter, or change at pleasure, and from time to time make such by-laws, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress, as they may deem expedient and proper for carrying into effect the objects of the said association or corporation, including the care, control, and education of children; the care, protection, instruction, and employment of destitute females; the care, nursing, and alleviation of the sufferings of sick or wounded persons, and such other objects of literature and charity as may be determined upon by their by-laws, as aforesaid, and which their means and net income may enable them to effect and support.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if, at any time hereafter, any of the persons hereinbefore named, or any of their successors, as Sisters of Mercy, in the District of Columbia, shall cease to belong to the said association or corporation, according to the said by-laws, such persons shall thereafter have no part or control in the proceedings of the said association or corporation under or in pursuance of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said association or corporation shall have power to appoint such officers, agents, and persons as may be necessary, and to construct or purchase such buildings or to create such establishments as may be required to effect and carry out the humane and charitable objects of its institution, in accordance with its by-laws and regulations, as aforesaid, under this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the schools and all other institutions of instruction, education, or employment, established by the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia, shall at all times be subject to the visitation and inspection of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any one of them, or the Committees on the District of Columbia in either House of Congress, or any other committee of Congress that either House may appoint, and the books, records, and proceedings of said Sisters of Mercy shall at all times be subject to the examination and inspection of said justices or any such committee.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That this act may, at any time hereafter, be amended, altered, or repealed, in whole or in part, according to the pleasure of Congress.

APPROVED, February 23, 1865.

CHAP. L.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind," approved February sixteen, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of said act as requires the teaching of the blind in said institution be and the same is hereby, repealed, and the corporate name and style thereof shall hereafter be "The Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb."

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause all indigent blind children who are now, or may hereafter become entitled, under the law as it now exists, to instruction in said institution, to be instructed in some institution for the education of the blind, in Maryland, or some other State, at a cost not greater for each pupil than is, or may be for the time being, paid by such State, and to cause the same to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

APPROVED, February 23, 1865.

CHAP. LII.—An Act to prevent Officers of the Army and Navy, and other Persons engaged in the Military and Naval Service of the United States, from interfering in Elections in the States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful for any military or naval officer of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State of the United States of America, unless it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls. And that it shall not be lawful for any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States to prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State of the United States of America, or in any manner to interfere with the freedom of any election in any State, or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State of the United States. Any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who violates this section of this act, shall, for every such offense, be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than three months, nor more than five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same; and any person convicted as aforesaid shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, under the Government of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines, from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to the laws of the State in which he shall offer to vote.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any officer or person in the military or naval service of the United States, who shall order or advise, or who shall directly or indirectly, by force, threat, menace, intimidation, or otherwise, prevent or attempt to prevent any qualified voter of any State of the United States of America from freely exercising the right of suffrage at any general or special election in any State of the United States, or who shall in like manner compel, or attempt to compel, any officer of an election in any such State to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified to vote, or who shall impose or attempt to impose any rules or regulations for conducting such election different from those prescribed by law, or interfere in any manner with any officer of said election in the discharge of his duties, shall for any such offense be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding five thousand dollars, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same, and any person convicted as aforesaid shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, under the Government of the United States.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

CHAP. LIII.—An Act to increase the Efficiency of the Medical Corps of the Army.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the medical director of an army in the field consisting of two or more Army corps, and the medical director of a military department in which there are United States general hospitals containing four thousand beds or upward, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and the medical director of an Army corps in the field, or of a department in which there are United States general hospitals containing less than four thousand beds, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry. But this increased rank and pay shall only continue to medical officers while discharging such special duties; and the assignments from time to time to such duty shall be at least two thirds of them made from among the surgeons and assistant surgeons of volunteers.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

CHAP. LIV.—An Act to create the Eastern Judicial District of the State of New York.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the counties of Kings, Queens, Suffolk, and Richmond, in the State of New York, with the waters thereof, are hereby constituted a separate judicial district of the United States, to be styled the eastern district of New York. The President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a district judge for said district who shall reside therein, and who shall possess the same powers and perform the same duties within said district which are now possessed and performed by the district judge of the southern district of New York. The said judge shall also receive the same compensation as is by law provided for the judge of said southern district. District and circuit courts for the trial of causes shall be held in the city of Brooklyn on the first Wednesday of every month. The courts so to be held shall have the same jurisdiction as is now or may hereafter be vested in other district and circuit courts of the United States. Such officers shall be appointed for said district and court, and in the same manner and with the same fees and emoluments as prescribed by law for other districts and courts of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the district court for the said eastern district shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district court for the southern district of New York over the waters within the counties of New York, Kings, Queens, and Suffolk, in the State of New York, and over all seizures and matters made or done in such waters; and all writs or other process or orders issued out of either of said courts, or by any judge thereof, shall run and be executed in any part of said waters.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in case of the inability on account of sickness of the judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, to hold any court therein, it shall be the duty of the judge of the said eastern district of New York to hold such court and do and perform all the acts and duties of the judge of said southern district without any additional compensation; and whenever, from pressure of public business or other cause, it shall be deemed desirable by the judge of said southern district of New York, that the judge of said eastern district perform the duties of a judge in said southern district, an order may be entered to that effect in the records of said district court, and thereupon the judge of said eastern district shall be empowered to do and perform, without additional compensation, within said southern district of New York, and in the district court thereof, all the acts and duties of the district judge thereof.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

CHAP. LV.—An Act supplemental to an Act entitled "An Act to annex a Part of the State of New Jersey to the Collection District of New York, and to appoint an Assistant Collector to reside at Jersey City," approved February twenty-one, eighteen hundred and sixty-three.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the assistant collector appointed under the act entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector to reside at Jersey City," approved February twenty-one, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, be, and he hereby is, authorized to enroll and license, according to the laws of the United States, all vessels engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries, owned in whole or in part by residents of the counties of Hudson and Bergen, in the State of New Jersey; and all such enrollments and licenses shall be as valid and effectual as if the same had been effected in any other port of the United States; and the said assistant collector, in the enrollment and licensing of vessels, shall be subject to the laws of the United States, and liable to all the penalties and responsibilities imposed upon collectors in like cases.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

CHAP. LVI.—An Act to authorize the Corporation of Georgetown to levy certain Taxes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the corporation of Georgetown be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to levy and collect, in the same manner in which other taxes are levied and collected in said town, an annual tax, not to exceed in any year fifteen hundredths of one per centum of the assessed value of the taxable property in said town, to be applied to the payment of the interest and the extinction of the principal of the debt recently contracted by said corporation in filling its quota under the several drafts for troops made during the present war.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation are hereby further authorized and empowered to levy and collect, in manner aforesaid, a sum sufficient to pay the said town's proportion of the direct tax imposed on the District of Columbia by the act of Congress approved August fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, and the cost and expenses of collecting the same.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

CHAP. LVII.—An Act authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth Street West.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the corporate authorities of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to open Sixth street west, from the canal to Maine avenue, under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in accordance with the plan approved in May, eighteen hundred and twenty-two, by James Monroe, then President of the United States: Provided, however, That Sixth street through the public grounds known as Armory square shall not be opened until after the removal of the Army hospital from such public ground, or until the consent of the Surgeon General of the United States Army shall be first had and obtained.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

CHAP. LVIII.—An Act in reference to Prosecutions for Libel in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all prosecutions or indictments for libel instituted, or which may hereafter be instituted, in the District of Columbia, the truth thereof may be given in evidence under the general issue as a justification of the alleged libel; and if it appear that the matter charged as libelous was true, and was written or published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the defendant shall be acquitted.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

CHAP. LIX.—An Act for changing the time for holding the Circuit Courts in the District of Virginia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the circuit courts in the district of Virginia, heretofore holden at Richmond, shall be held at Norfolk, on the first Monday in May and on the fourth Monday of November in each year; and all proceedings and process in or issuing out of the said court which are or may be made returnable to any other times or places appointed for holding the same than those above specified, shall be deemed legally returnable on the days and at the place above specified, and not otherwise; and all suits and other proceedings in said court which stand continued to any other time or place than those above specified, shall be deemed continued to the place and time prescribed by this act, and no other.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

CHAP. LXIV.—An Act providing for a District and a Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nevada, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Nevada shall hereafter constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Nevada; and for said district a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States shall be appointed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said district of Nevada shall be attached to and constitute a part of the tenth circuit; and a term of the circuit court of the United States for the said district shall be held in the city of Carson, in the State of Nevada, on the first Monday of March, and on the first Monday of August, and on the first Monday of December of each year; and a term of the district court of the United States for the said district shall be held at the said city of Carson on the first Monday of February, and on the first Monday of May, and on the first Monday of October of each year.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the district court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and the judge thereof, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction possessed by the other district courts and district judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the circuit court of the United States for the said district of Nevada, and the judge thereof, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction in said district which are vested in said court and said judge in the other districts of the tenth circuit.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the district judge appointed for the district of Nevada shall receive as his compensation the sum of thirty-five hundred dollars a year, payable in four equal installments, on the first days of January, April, July, and October, of each year.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the marshal and district attorney of the United States for said district of Nevada, and also for the district of Oregon, shall severally be entitled to charge and receive for the services they may perform double the fees and compensation allowed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February twenty-six, eighteen hundred and fifty-three: Provided, That the aggregate compensation allowed said officers shall not exceed the amount provided for such officers by said act.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the third, fourth, and fifth sections of the act of February nineteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An act amendatory of, and supplementary to, an act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, shall be applicable to the appointment of special sessions of the circuit courts in the district of Nevada, and to the appointment of clerks and deputy clerks of the circuit courts of the districts of Nevada and Oregon; and that the clerk of the circuit court in the districts of Nevada, Oregon, and California shall be also clerk of the district court in said districts, and shall receive for like services the same fees and compensation which are allowed by law to the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States for California: Provided, That the clerk in each of said districts shall be allowed by the Secretary of the Interior to retain of the fees and emoluments received by him as clerk of both courts, over and above the necessary expenses of his offices and necessary clerk hire included, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, only such sum per annum as is now allowed by law to the clerk of one of said courts, and shall pay the remainder into the public Treasury, under oath, in the manner and under the regulations now prescribed by law.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the district court of the United States for the district of Nevada, or to the supreme court of the State of Nevada, as the nature of said appeal or writ of error may require, and each of these courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Nevada Territory as to all such cases, with full power to hear and determine the same, and to award mesne or final process thereon. And from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, prior to its admission into the Union as a State, the parties to said judgments and decrees shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Federal courts as they would have had under the laws of the United States if this act had been passed simultaneously with the act admitting said State into the Union: Provided, That said appeals shall be prosecuted and said writs of error sued out at any time before the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That no possessory action between individuals in any of the courts of the United States for the recovery of any mining title, or for damages to any such title, shall be affected by the fact that the paramount title to the land on which such mines are, is in the United States, but each case shall be adjudged by the law of possession.

APPROVED, February 27, 1865.

CHAP. LXVII.—An Act to revive certain Provisions of the Act entitled "An Act further to provide for the collection of Duties on Imports and Tonnage," approved March three, eighteen hundred and fifteen, and for other purposes.

of the customs, as well in any adjoining district as that to which he belongs, to stop, search, and examine any carriage or vehicle of any kind whatsoever, and to stop any person traveling on foot or beast of burden on which he shall suspect there are goods, wares, or merchandise which are subject to duty, or which shall have been introduced into the United States in any manner contrary to law; and if such officer shall stop any goods, wares, or merchandise on any such carriage, vehicle, person traveling on foot or beast of burden, which he shall have probable cause to believe are subject to duty or have been unlawfully introduced into the United States, he shall seize and secure the same for trial," be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted; and every such beast of burden, carriage, or vehicle, together with the teams or other motive power, and all the appurtenances used in conveying such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture in like manner as is by law now provided in regard to such goods, wares, and merchandise; and all fines, penalties, and forfeitures recovered under this act, or in consequence of such seizures, shall be disposed of as is provided in other cases by the ninety-first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March second, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine; and the last proviso of said ninety-first section is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the power and authority given to collectors, naval officers, and surveyors by the sixty-eighth section of the said last-mentioned act be, and the same are hereby, extended to inspectors of the customs; and any officer or other person entitled to or interested in a part or share of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under this or any other law of the United States, may be examined as a witness in any of the proceedings for the recovery of such fine, penalty, or forfeiture by either of the parties thereto, and such examination shall not deprive such witness of his or her share or interest in such fine, penalty, or forfeiture.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in case any store, warehouse, or other building shall be upon or near the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, and there is reason to believe that dutiable goods are deposited or have been placed therein or carried through or into the same without payment of duties, and in violation of law, and the collector, deputy collector, naval officer, or surveyor of customs, shall make oath before any magistrate competent to administer the same, that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that such offense has been therein committed, such officer shall have the right to search such building and the premises belonging thereto; and if any such goods shall be found therein, the same, together with such building, shall be seized, forfeited, and disposed of according to law, and the said building shall be forthwith taken down or removed. And any person or persons who shall have received or deposited in such building, or carried through the same, any goods, as aforesaid, or shall have aided therein, in violation of law, shall, upon due conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the first section of the act of April second, eighteen hundred and forty-four, entitled "An act directing the disposition of certain unclaimed goods, wares, or merchandise, seized for being illegally imported into the United States," be so amended that in place of the word "one," wherever the same may be found in said section, the word "five" shall be inserted.

APPROVED, February 28, 1865.

CHAP. LXXVII.—An Act to provide Ways and Means for the Support of the Government.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized, any sums not exceeding in the aggregate six hundred millions of dollars, and to issue therefor bonds or Treasury notes of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe; and so much thereof as may be issued in bonds shall be of denominations not less than fifty dollars, and may be made payable at any period not more than forty years from date of issue, or may be made redeemable, at the pleasure of the Government, at or after any period not less than five years nor more than forty years from date, or may be made redeemable and payable as aforesaid, as may be expressed upon their face; and so much thereof as may be issued in Treasury notes may be made convertible into any bonds authorized by this act, and may be of such denominations—not less than fifty dollars—and bear such dates and be made redeemable or payable at such periods as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury may be deemed expedient. And the interest on such bonds shall be payable semi-annually; and on Treasury notes authorized by this act the interest may be made payable semi-annually, or annually, or at maturity thereof; and the principal, or interest, or both, may be made payable in coin or in other lawful money: Provided, That the rate of interest on any such bonds or Treasury notes, when payable in coin, shall not exceed six per centum per annum; and when not payable in coin shall not exceed seven and three tenths per centum per annum; and the rate and character of interest shall be expressed on all such bonds or Treasury notes: And provided further, That the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, shall be so construed as to authorize the issue of bonds of any description authorized by this act. And any Treasury notes or other obligations bearing interest, issued under any act of Congress, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the consent of the holder, be converted into any description of bonds authorized by this act; and no bonds so authorized shall be considered a part of the amount of six hundred millions hereinbefore authorized.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury may dispose of any of the bonds or other obligations issued under this act, either in the United States or elsewhere, in such manner, and at such rates, and under such conditions, as he may think advisable, for coin, or for other lawful money of the United States, or for any Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value, which have been or may be issued under any act of Congress; and may, at his discretion, issue bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act, in payment for any requisitions for materials or supplies which shall have been made by the appropriate Department or officers upon the Treasury of the United States, on receiving notice in writing through the Department or office making the requisition, that the owner of the claim for which the requisition is issued desires to subscribe for an amount of loan that will cover said requisition, or any part thereof; and all bonds or other obligations issued under this act shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, in relation to forms, inscriptions, devices, and the printing, attestation, sealing, signing, and counterfeiting thereof, with such others as are applicable, shall apply to the bonds and other obligations issued under this act: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing the issue of legal-tender notes in any form; and a sum, not exceeding one per centum of the amount of bonds and other obligations issued under this act, is hereby appropriated to pay the expense of preparing and issuing the same, and disposing thereof.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXVIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to provide Internal Revenue to support the Government, to pay Interest on the Public Debt, and for other purposes," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be, and the same is hereby, amended as hereinafter set forth, namely:

That section four be amended by striking out the word "five," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten."

That section eight be amended by striking out, after the words "within each of which the," the words "Secretary of the Treasury, whenever there shall be a vacancy, or the public interest shall require, shall appoint, with the approval of the said Commissioner, one assistant assessor, who shall be a resident of the district of said assessor," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "assessor, whenever there shall be a vacancy, shall appoint, with the approval of said Commissioner, one or more assistant assessor[s], who shall be a resident of such assessment district."

That section fourteen be amended by striking out the word "fifty," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "twenty-five."

That section twenty-five be amended by inserting after the words "four hundred thousand dollars," the words "and not exceeding one million of dollars, and one eighth of one per centum on all sums above one million of dollars;" by inserting after the words "reasonable charges for," the word "advertising;" and by striking out all of the first proviso; and by striking out the word "further" in the second proviso.

That section twenty-six be amended by striking out the word "apportionment," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "appointment."

That section twenty-eight be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "That each of said collectors shall, within twenty days after receiving his annual collection list from the assessors, give notice, by advertisement published in each county in his collection district, in one newspaper printed in such county, if any such there be, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places in each county in his collection district, that the said duties have become due and payable, and state the time and place within said county at which he or his deputy will attend to receive the same, which time shall not be less than ten days after such notification. And if any person shall neglect to pay, as aforesaid, for more than ten days, it shall be the duty of the collector or his deputy to issue to such person a notice, to be left at his dwelling or usual place of business, or be sent by mail, demanding the payment of said duties or taxes, stating the amount thereof, with a fee of twenty cents for the issuing and service of such notice, and with four cents for each mile actually and necessarily traveled in serving the same. And if such person shall not pay the duties or taxes, and the fee of twenty cents and mileage as aforesaid, within ten days after the service or the sending by mail of such notice, it shall be the duty of the collector or his deputy to collect the said duties or taxes, and fee of twenty cents and mileage, with a penalty of ten per centum additional upon the amount of duties. And with respect to all such duties or taxes as are not included in the annual lists aforesaid, and all taxes and duties the collection of which is not otherwise provided for in this act, it shall be the duty of each collector, in person or by deputy, to demand payment thereof, in the manner last mentioned, within ten days from and after receiving the list thereof from the assessor, or within twenty days from and after the expiration of the time within which such duty or tax should have been paid; and if the annual or other duties shall not be paid within ten days from and after such demand therefor, it shall be lawful for such collector, or his deputies, to proceed to collect the said duties or taxes, with ten per centum additional thereto, as aforesaid, by distraint and sale of the goods, chattels, or effects of the persons delinquent as aforesaid. And in case of distraint it shall be the duty of the officer charged with the collection to make, or cause to be made, an account of the goods or chattels distrained, a copy of which, signed by the officer making such distraint, shall be left with the owner or possessor of such goods, chattels, or effects, or at his or her dwelling, or usual place of business, with some person of suitable age and discretion, if any such can be found, with a note of the sum demanded, and the time and place of sale; and the said officer shall forthwith cause a notification to be published in some newspaper within the county wherein said distraint is made, if there is a newspaper published in said county, or to be publicly posted up at the post office, if there be one within five miles, nearest to the residence of the person whose property shall be distrained, and in not less than two other public places, which notice shall specify the articles distrained, and the time and place for the sale thereof, which time shall not be less than ten nor more than twenty days from the date of such notification, [and] the place proposed for sale not more than five miles distant from the place of making such distraint. And in any case in which any person, bank, association, company, or corporation required by law to make return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall refuse or neglect to make such return within the time specified, the amount of circulation, deposit, and capital, or either, shall be estimated by the proper assessor or assistant assessor, and shall be certified by him to the Commissioner. And in all cases in which the person, bank, association, company, or corporation required by law to make payment of taxes to the Commissioner, shall neglect or refuse to make such payment within the time required, the Commissioner shall certify the amount of tax due by such person, bank, association, or corporation, with all the penalties, additions, and expenses accruing, to the collector of the proper district, who shall collect the same by distraint and sale, as in other cases. And the same proceedings may be had to enforce the collection of taxes which have already accrued and which still remain unpaid. And if any person, bank, association, company, or corporation, liable to pay any duty, shall neglect or refuse to pay the same after demand, the amount shall be a lien in favor of the United States from the time it was due until paid, with the interests, penalties, and costs that may accrue in addition thereto, upon all property and rights to property; and the collector, after demand, may levy or by warrant may authorize a deputy collector to levy upon all property and rights to property belonging to such person, bank, association, company, or corporation, or on which the said lien exists, for the payment of the sum due as aforesaid, with interest and penalty for non-payment, and also of such further sum as shall be sufficient for the fees, costs, and expenses of such levy. And in all cases of sale, the certificate of such sale by the collector shall have the same effect as is prescribed by the one hundred and nineteenth section of the act to which this is an amendment. And all persons and officers of companies or corporations are required, on demand of a collector or deputy collector about to distraint or having distrained on any property and rights of property, to exhibit all books containing or supposed to contain evidence or statements relating to the subject or subjects of distraint, or the property or rights of property liable to distraint for the tax so due as aforesaid: Provided, That in any case of distraint for the payment of the duties or taxes aforesaid, the goods, chattels, or effects so distrained shall and may be restored to the owner or possessor, if prior to the sale payment of the amount due or tender thereof shall be made to the proper officer charged with the collection of the full amount demanded, together with such fee for levying, and such sum for the necessary and reasonable expense of removing, advertising, and keeping [the] goods, chattels, or effects so distrained, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but in case of non-payment or tender as aforesaid, the said officers shall proceed to sell the said goods, chattels, or effects at public auction, and shall and may retain from the proceeds of such sale the amount demandable for the use of the United States, with the necessary and reasonable expenses of distraint and sale, and a commission of five per centum thereon for his own use, rendering the overplus, if any there be, to the person whose goods, chattels, or effects shall have been distrained: Provided further, That there shall be exempt from distraint the tools or implements of a trade or profession, one cow, arms, and provisions, and household furniture kept for use, school-books, and apparel necessary for a family."

That section thirty-eight be amended by striking therefrom the words "thirty-five," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "thirty-six."

That section forty be amended by inserting after the words "appointment of a successor," the words: "Provided, That in case it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the interest of the Government shall so require, he may, by his order, direct said duties to be performed by such other one of the said deputies as he may in such order designate."

That section fifty-two be amended by inserting before the words "That all assessors," the words "And be it further enacted;" by inserting after the word "deputies," the words "revenue agents;" and by striking out after the word "charged" the word "and," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "or."

That section fifty-three be amended by inserting after the word "distiller," where it first occurs, the words "before distilling any spirits;" by striking out after the word "any," and preceding the words "still or stills," the word "additional;" by striking out after the word "used," and preceding the words "shall be erected," the words "as aforesaid," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for distilling;" and by inserting after the words "shall be erected," the words "or used."

That section fifty-four be amended by striking out the words "the same," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and owning the same, and owning the building used as a distillery, and the and on which the same is located, and if the building or land is leased, the terms and conditions of the lease;" and by striking out the word "one," land inserting in lieu thereof the word "three."

That section fifty-five be amended by inserting after the words "said duties shall be a lien," the words "on the spirit distilled and;" and by adding at the end of the first proviso the words "except when made and used in the manufacture of vinegar or acetic acid, in which case the duties shall be collected on the basis of the actual proof."

That section fifty-six be amended by adding at the end of the section the following words, to wit: "and in all sales of spirits hereafter made, where not otherwise specially agreed, a gallon shall be taken to be a gallon of first proof, according to the standard set forth and declared for the inspection and gauging of spirits throughout the United States."

That section fifty-seven be amended by striking out the words "twenty-five," in the last proviso, and inserting "fifty" in its place; and by adding to the said proviso the following words: "and distilled from apples or peaches, shall pay one dollar and fifty cents per gallon."

That section fifty-nine be amended by striking out the words "so inspected and," and also "forthwith," in the last clause of the first sentence; and by adding to the said sentence, after the word "warehouse," the words "before the day prescribed by law for making return of the same;" and by striking out the words "one hundred," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "three hundred."

That section sixty-one be amended by striking out after the words "and all," the words "refined coal-oil," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "distilled or refined coal-oil, distillate benzoin or benzole," also by inserting after the word "warehouse," and before the words "and no drawback," the following words: "and the same fees shall be paid for exports as are charged to exporters for like services in the custom-house;" and by inserting after the words "redistilled," and before the words "for export," the words "or canned."

That section sixty-eight be amended by inserting after the word "suits" the words "and shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year;" and that the proviso to said section be amended by adding after the words "forfeiture shall have" the word "been;" and by striking out the word "the" where it occurs the second time before the word "nature."

That section seventy-four be amended by striking out the word "or" after the word "with," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the word "one;" and by striking out the words "and hold the same until the license is produced," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and the assessor of the district in which the seizure has occurred may, on ten days' notice, published in any newspaper in the district, or served personally on the peddler, or at his dwelling-house, require such peddler to show cause, if any he has, why the horses, wagon, and contents, pack, bundle, or basket so seized shall not be forfeited; and, in case no sufficient cause is shown, the assessor may direct a forfeiture, and issue an order to the collector or to any deputy collector of the district for the sale of the property so forfeited; and one half of the same, after payment of the expenses of the proceedings, shall be paid to the officer making the seizure, and the other half thereof to the collector for the use of the United States."

That section seventy-nine be amended by inserting in the first paragraph, after the words "claim agents," the words "patent agents;" by striking out, in the same paragraph, the words "carrying on such," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "may carry on;" by striking out, in the same paragraph, the words "may transact such business;" Provided, That no license shall hereafter issue until the managers of a lottery now existing shall give bond, in the sum of one thousand dollars, that the person receiving such license shall not sell any ticket, or supplementary ticket of such lottery which has not been duly stamped according to law; by inserting, in paragraph nine, after the words "other securities," the words "for themselves or others;" by striking out from said paragraph the words "and shall make oath or affirmation, according to the form to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that all their transactions are made for a commission;" by striking out the proviso at the end of paragraph "twenty-eight;" by adding to paragraph thirty-two the following proviso: "Provided further, That no man between the ages of twenty and forty-five who is not enrolled for military duty, or regularly exempted from enrollment or draft for physical debility, shall be entitled to a license as a peddler."

By striking out all of paragraph "forty-nine," and inserting in lieu thereof the following, to wit:

"Forty-nine. Miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars. Every person, firm, or company who shall employ others in the business of mining for coal, or for gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other minerals, not having taken out a license as a manufacturer, and no other, shall be regarded as a miner under this act: Provided, That this shall not apply to any miner whose receipts from his mine shall not exceed annually one thousand dollars."

"Fifty. A license of ten dollars shall be required of every person, firm, or company engaged in the carrying or delivery of money, valuable papers, or any articles for pay, or doing an express business, whose gross receipts therefrom exceed the sum of six hundred dollars per annum. But one license fee of ten dollars shall be required from any one person, firm, or company in respect to all the business to be done by such person, firm, or company on a continuous route, and the payment of such license fee shall cover all business done upon such route by such person, firm, or company, anywhere in the United States; and such license fee shall be required only from the principal in such business, and not from any subordinate."

"Fifty-one. Substitute brokers shall pay one hundred dollars for each and every license, and in addition thereto ten dollars for each substitute procured by him and actually mustered into the military service of the United States. Every person who shall furnish or offer to furnish for pay, fee, or reward, volunteers, representative recruits, or substitutes for men drafted or liable to be drafted, for the military or naval service of the United States, shall be deemed a substitute broker under this act: Provided, however, That persons appointed by any State, county, city, township, or district, or the officers thereof, to procure the enlistment of volunteers or substitutes to fill the quota of such State, county, city, township, or district, for the military service of the United States, under the call of the President of the United States, shall not be considered substitute brokers: And provided further, That such person or agent shall receive no compensation except that which is given by such State, county, town, city, or district."

"Fifty-two. Insurance brokers shall pay twenty-five dollars for each license. Any person who shall negotiate or procure insurance in behalf of another person or party for which he shall receive any pay, commission, or compensation, shall be regarded as an insurance broker under this act," and the licenses herein provided for shall take effect on the first day of May next."

That section eighty-one be amended by striking therefrom the words "seventy-three," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "seventy-four," and by striking out the words "to vintners," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "nor to vintners."

That section ninety be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That any person, firm, company, or corporation, now or hereafter engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars of any description whatsoever, shall be, and hereby is, required to make out and deliver to the assistant assessor of the assessment district a true statement or inventory of the quantity of each of the different kinds of tobacco, snuff, flour, snuff, cigars, tin-foil, licorice, and stems held or owned by him or them on the first day of January of each year, or at the time of commencing business under this act, setting forth what portion of said goods was manufactured or produced by him or them, and what was purchased not be paid within five days after demand thereof, from others, whether chewing, smoking, fine-cut, shorts, pressed, plug, snuff-flour, or prepared snuff, or cigars, which statement or inventory shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of such person or persons, and be in manner and form as prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and every such person, company, or corporation shall keep in a book, in such manner and form as said Commissioner may prescribe, an accurate account of all the articles aforesaid thereafter purchased by him or them, the quantity of tobacco, snuff, snuff-flour, or cigars, of whatever description sold, consumed, or removed for consumption or sale, or removed from the place of manufacture; and he or they shall, on or before the tenth day of each month, furnish to the assistant assessor of the district a true and accurate copy of the entries in said book during the preceding month, which copy shall be verified by oath or affirmation; and in case the duties shall the said collector may, on one day's notice, dis-train for the same, with ten per centum additional on the amount thereof, subject to all the provisions of law relating to licenses, returns, assessments, payment of taxes, liens, fines, penalties, and forfeitures, not inconsistent herewith in the case of other manufacturers; and such duty shall be paid by the manufacturer or the person for whom the goods are manufactured, as the assessor may deem best for the collection of the revenue: Provided, That it shall be the duty of any manufacturer or vender of tin-foil or other material used in covering manufactured tobacco, on demand of any officer of internal revenue, to render to such officer a correct statement, verified by oath or affirmation, of the quantity and amount of tin-foil or other materials sold or delivered to any person or persons named in such demand; and in case of refusal or neglect to render such statement, or of cause to believe such statement to be incorrect or fraudulent, the assessor of the district may cause an examination of persons, books, and papers to be made in the same manner as provided in the fourteenth section of this act: Provided further, That manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, may be transferred, without payment of the duty, to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with law and Treasury regulations, under such rules and regulations and upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, said bonds or other security to be taken by the collector of the district from which such removal is made; and may be transported from such a warehouse to a bonded warehouse used for the storage of merchandise at any port of entry, and may be withdrawn from bonded warehouse for consumption on payment of the duty, or removed for export to a foreign country without payment of duty, in conformity with the provisions of law relating to the removal of distilled spirits, all the rules, regulations, and conditions of which, so far as applicable, shall apply to tobacco, snuff, or cigars in bonded warehouse. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed upon any manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, upon which any excise duty has been paid, either before or after it has been placed in bonded warehouse."

That section ninety-one be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That all manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, shall, before the same is used or removed for consumption, be inspected and weighed by an inspector appointed under the fifty-eighth section of the act to which this is an amendment, who shall mark or affix a stamp upon the box or other package containing such tobacco, snuff, or cigars, in a manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, denoting the kind or form of tobacco and the weight of such package, with the date of inspection and the name of the inspector. The fees of such inspector shall in all cases be paid by the owner of the manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, so inspected and weighed. And the penalties for the fraudulent marking of any box or other package of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, and for any fraudulent attempt to evade the duties on tobacco, snuff, or cigars, so inspected, by changing in any manner the package or the marks thereon, shall be the same as are provided in relation to distilled spirits by existing laws. And all cigars manufactured after the passage of this act shall be packed in boxes. And any manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, which shall be sold or pass out of the hands of the manufacturer or importer, except into a bonded warehouse, without the inspection marks or stamps affixed by the inspector, unless otherwise provided, shall be forfeited, and may be seized wherever found, and shall be sold, one half of the proceeds of such sale to be paid to the informer, and the other moiety to the United States. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall keep an account of all stamps delivered to the several inspectors; and said inspectors shall also keep an account of all stamps by them used or placed upon boxes containing cigars, and of all tobacco, snuff, and cigars receiving such freight or transportation." And that section one hundred and three be amended by adding at the end of said section the following: "And provided further, That no tax under this section shall be assessed upon any person whose gross receipts do not exceed one thousand dollars per annum."

That section one hundred and five be amended by striking out, at the end thereof, the words "for the quarter then next preceding."

That section one hundred and nine be amended by striking out, after the words "one hundred and," the word "two," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "three."

That section one hundred and ten be amended by striking out, after the words "and redemption thereof," the words "nor to any savings bank having no capital stock, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same on interest for the benefit of the depositors only, and which do no other business of banking."

That section one hundred and sixteen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That there shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the annual gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interests, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a duty of five per centum on the excess over six hundred dollars and not exceeding five thousand dollars, and a duty of ten per centum on the excess over five thousand dollars; and in ascertaining the income of any person liable to an income tax, the amount of income received from institutions whose officers, as required by law, withhold a per centum of the dividends made by such institutions and pay the same to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or other officer authorized to receive the same, shall be included; and the amount so withheld shall be deducted from the tax which otherwise would be assessed upon such person. And the duty herein provided for shall be assessed, collected, and paid upon the gains, profits, and income for the year ending the thirty-first day of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said duty: Provided, That incomes derived from interest upon notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, and also all premiums on gold and coupons shall be included in estimating incomes under this section. Provided further, That only one deduction of six hundred dollars shall be made from the aggregate incomes of all the members of any family composed of parents and minor children, or husband and wife: And provided further, That net profits realized by sales of real estate purchased within the year for which income is estimated, shall be chargeable as income; and losses on sales of real estate purchased within the year for which income is estimated, shall be deducted from the income of such year."

That section one hundred and seventeen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That in estimating the annual gains, profits, and income of any person, all national, State, county, and municipal taxes paid within the year shall be deducted from the gains, profits, or income of the person who has actually paid the same, whether owner, tenant, or mortgagor; also the salary or pay received for services in the civil, military, naval, or other service of the United States, including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, above the rate of six hundred dollars per annum; also the amount paid by any person for the rent of the homestead used or occupied by himself or his family, and the rental value of any homestead used or occupied by any person or by his family, in his own right or in the right of his wife, shall not be included and assessed as part of the income of such person. In estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of any person, the interest received or accrued upon all notes, bonds, and mortgages, or other forms of indebtedness bearing interest, whether paid or not, if good and collectable, less the interest paid by or due from such person, shall be included and assessed as part of the income of such person for each year; and also all income or gains derived from the purchase and sale of stocks or other property, real or personal, and of live stock, and the amount of live stock, sugar, wool, butter, cheese, pork, beef, mutton, or other meats, hay and grain, or other vegetable or other productions, being the growth or produce of the estate of such person sold, not including any part thereof unsold or on hand during the year next preceding the thirty-first of December, until the same shall be sold, shall be included and assessed as part of the income of such person for each year, and his share of the gains and profits of all companies, whether incorporated or partnership, shall be included in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of any person entitled to the same, whether divided or otherwise. In estimating deductions from income, as aforesaid, when any person rents buildings, lands, or other property, or hires labor to cultivate land, or to conduct any other business from which such income is actually derived, or pays interest upon any actual incumbrance thereon, the amount actually paid for such rent, labor, or interest, shall be deducted; and also the amount paid out for usual or ordinary repairs, not exceeding the average paid out for such purposes for the preceding five years, shall be deducted, but no deduction shall be made for any amount paid out for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments, made to increase the value of any property or estate: Provided, That in cases where the salary or other compensation paid to any person in the employment or service of the United States shall not exceed the rate of six hundred dollars per annum, or shall be by fees, or uncertain or irregular in the amount or in the time during which the same shall have accrued or been earned, such salary or other compensation shall be included in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of the person to whom the same shall have been paid, in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe."

That section one hundred and eighteen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "That it shall be the duty of all persons of lawful age to make and render a list or return, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to the assistant assessor of the district in which they reside, of the amount of their income, gains, and profits, as aforesaid; and all guardians and trustees, whether as executors, administrators, or in any other fiduciary capacity, shall make and render a list or return, as aforesaid, to the assistant assessor of the district in which such guardian or trustee resides, of the amount of income, gains, and profits of any minor or person for whom they act as guardian or trustee; and the assistant assessor shall require every list or return to be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party rendering it, and may increase the amount of any list or return if he has reason to believe that the same is understated; and in case any person, guardian, or trustee shall neglect or refuse to make and render such list or return, or shall render a false or fraudulent list or return, it shall be the duty of the assessor or the assistant assessor to make such list, according to the best information he can obtain, by the examination of such person, and his books and accounts, or any other evidence, and to add twenty-five per centum as a penalty to the amount of the duty due on such list in all cases of willful neglect or refusal to make and render a list or return, and, in all cases of a false or fraudulent list or return having been rendered, to add one hundred per centum, as a penalty, to the amount of duty ascertained to be due, the duty and the additions thereto as penalty to be assessed and collected in the manner provided for in other cases of willful neglect or refusal to render a list or return, or of rendering a false and fraudulent return: Provided, That any party, in his or her own behalf, or as guardian or trustee, shall be permitted to declare, under oath or affirmation, the form and manner of which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that he or she, or his or her ward or beneficiary, was not possessed of an income of six hundred dollars, liable to be assessed according to the provisions of this act; or may declare that he or she has been assessed and paid an income duty elsewhere in the same year, under authority of the United States, upon his or her gains and profits, as prescribed by law, and if the assistant assessor shall be satisfied of the truth of the declaration, shall thereupon be exempt from income duty in said district; or if the list or return of any party shall have been increased by the assistant assessor, such party may exhibit his books and accounts, and be permitted to prove and declare, under oath or affirmation, the amount of annual income liable to be assessed; but such oaths and evidence shall not be considered as conclusive of the facts, and no deductions claimed in such cases shall be made or allowed until approved by the assistant assessor. Any person feeling aggrieved by the decision of the assistant assessor in such cases may appeal to the assessor of the district, and his decision thereon, unless reversed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be final, and the form, time, and manner of proceedings shall be subject to rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

That section one hundred and nineteen be amended by striking out the words "for thirty days," and, after the words "for ten days after," inserting the words "notice and."

That section one hundred and twenty be amended by striking out, at the end thereof, the word "act," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "section."

That section one hundred and twenty-five be amended by striking therefrom the word "and," following the word "custody," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "any."

That section one hundred and thirty-three be amended by adding, at the end thereof, the following words: "Provided, That no duty shall be levied in respect of any succession vesting before or subsequent to the passage of this act, where the successor shall be the wife of the predecessor."

That section one hundred and thirty-five be amended by striking therefrom the word "extension," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "extinction."

That section one hundred and forty-nine be amended by striking out the word "assment," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "assessment."

That section one hundred and fifty-eight be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following, to wit: "That any person or persons who shall make, sign, or issue, or who shall cause to be made, signed, or issued, any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever, or shall accept, negotiate, or pay, or cause to be accepted, negotiated, or paid, any bill of exchange, draft, or order, or promissory note, for the payment of money, without the same being duly stamped or having thereupon an adhesive stamp for denoting the duty chargeable thereon, with intent to evade the provisions of this act, shall for every such offense forfeit the sum of fifty dollars, and such instrument, document, or paper, bill, draft, order, or note shall be deemed invalid and of no effect: Provided, That the title of a purchaser of land, by deed duly stamped, shall not be defeated or affected by the want of a proper stamp on any deed conveying said land by any person from, through, or under whom his grantor claims or holds title: And provided further, That hereafter, in all cases where the party has not affixed to any instrument [as] required by the one hundred and fifty-first section of the act of June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, or the schedule marked B thereunto annexed, and the stamp thereby required to be thereunto affixed, at the time of making or issuing the said instrument, and he or they or any party having an interest therein shall be subsequently desirous of affixing such stamp to said instrument, he or they shall appear before the collector of the revenue of the proper district, who shall, upon the payment of the price of the proper stamp required by law, and of a penalty of fifty dollars, and, where the whole amount of the duty denoted by the stamp required shall exceed the sum of fifty dollars, on payment also of interest at the rate of six per cent. on said duty from the day on which such stamp ought to have been affixed, affix the proper stamp to such instrument and note upon the margin of said instrument the date of his so doing, and the fact that such penalty has been paid, and such instrument shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid to all intents and purposes as if stamped when made or issued: And provided further, That where it shall appear to said collector, upon oath or otherwise, to his satisfaction that any such instrument has not been duly stamped at the time of making or issuing the same by reason of accident, mistake, inadvertence, or urgent necessity, and without any willful design to defraud the United States of the stamp duty, or to evade or delay the payment thereof, then and in such case, if such instrument shall, within twelve calendar months after the making or issuing thereof, be brought to the said collector of revenue to be stamped and the stamp duty chargeable thereon shall be paid, it shall be lawful for the said collector to remit the penalty aforesaid and to cause such instrument to be duly stamped."

That section one hundred and sixty be amended by inserting before the word "injury" the word "accidental," and by striking out the words "while traveling;" also by striking out after the words "nor on certificates" the word "or," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "of;" and by striking out the words "other articles," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "hay."

That section one hundred and sixty-five be amended by striking out in the proviso the words "act contained," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "section."

That section one hundred and sixty-seven be amended by striking out the word "or" where it occurs the second time, and inserting after the word "sell" the words "expose for sale."

That section one hundred and sixty-eight be amended by striking out the words "lucifer or friction matches and cigar-lights or wax tapers."

That section one hundred and sixty-nine be amended by inserting after the words "who shall offer," the words "or expose;" and by inserting after the words "so offered," the words "or exposed;" and by inserting in the proviso, after the words "imported articles," the words "except lucifer or friction matches, cigar-lights, and wax tapers."

That "Schedule B," preceding section one hundred and seventy-one, be amended in the paragraph marked "receipts," by inserting, after the word "property," the words "except receipts issued by any persons, firms, or companies doing business as an express or express company on the delivery of any property for transportation," and that "Schedule C," preceding section one hundred and seventy-one, be amended in all the paragraphs concerning "playing-cards" by striking out, wherever it occurs, the word "retail." Add at the end of the paragraph marked "receipts," the following: "Provided, That when two or more persons shall sign the same receipt, one or more stamps, equal in value to the several stamps required by this act, may be affixed to said receipt in lieu of said several stamps."

That "Schedule B," preceding section one hundred and seventy-one, be further amended by striking out the word "lease" in the proviso in the clause taxing "mortgages," &c.; and also by adding to said proviso the following: "And provided further, That upon each and every assignment of any lease a stamp duty shall be required and paid equal to that imposed on the original instrument, increased by a stamp duty on the consideration or value of the assignment equal to that imposed upon the conveyance of land for similar consideration or value."

That section one hundred and seventy-one be amended by inserting before the words "refined coal-oil," the words "crude petroleum or rock-oil;" and after the words "all descriptions," by inserting the words "bullion, quicksilver, lucifer or friction matches, cigar-lights, and wax tapers."

That section one hundred and seventy-nine be amended by striking therefrom the words "if a collector or deputy collector," and by adding at the end of the words "use of the United States," the words "and where any penalty is paid without suit, or before judgment, and a moiety of the same is claimed by any person as informer, the Secretary of the Treasury, on application to him, under such regulations as he shall prescribe, shall determine whether any claimant is entitled to such moiety and to whom the same shall be paid."

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the proviso to section one hundred and sixty-nine of the act to which this act is an amendment shall not be held to apply to lucifer matches, friction matches, or other articles made in part of wood and used for like purposes, nor to cigar-lights and wax tapers.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, the gross amount of all duties, taxes, and revenues received or collected by virtue of the several acts to provide internal revenue to support the Government and to pay the interest on the public debt, and of any other act or acts that may now or hereafter be in force connected with the internal revenues, shall be paid by the officers, collectors, or agents receiving or collecting the same, daily into the Treasury of the United States, under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, without any abatement or deduction on account of salary, compensation, fees, costs, charges, expenses or claims of any description whatever, anything in any law to the contrary notwithstanding. And all moneys now directed by law to be paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, including those derived from the sale of stamps, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States by the party making such payment; and a certificate of such payment stating the name of the depositor and the specific account on which the deposit was made, signed by the Treasurer, Assistant Treasurer, designated depository, or proper officer of a deposit bank, and transmitted to and received by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be deemed a compliance with the law requiring payment to be made to the Commissioner, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That in districts where, from the distance of the officer, collector, or agent receiving or collecting such duties, taxes, and revenues from a proper Government depository, the Secretary of the Treasury may deem it proper, he may extend the time for making such payment, not exceeding, however, in any case, the period of one month.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That so much money as may be necessary for the payment of the lawful expenses, incident to carrying into effect the various acts relative to the assessment and collection of the internal revenues after the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, until the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and not otherwise provided for, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. And it shall be the duty of each of the collectors of internal revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct to act as disbursing agents to pay the aforesaid expenses, without increased compensation therefor, and to give good and sufficient bonds and sureties for the faithful performance of their duties as such disbursing agents, in such sum and form as shall be prescribed by the First Comptroller of the Treasury and approved by the Secretary.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the duties imposed in section ninety-four of the act to which this is an amendment, as heretofore amended, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the goods, wares, and merchandise therein mentioned, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, an increase of one fifth or twenty per centum of the duties or rates of duty now provided in said section, whether ad valorem or specific: Provided, That the additional duties or rates of duty herein mentioned shall not apply to coal illuminating oil, refined, and naphtha, benzine and benzole, wood screws, paper of all descriptions, printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and similar publications, cotton, manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of ten per centum on the amount of notes of any State bank or State banking association, paid out by them after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That any existing bank organized under the laws of any State, having a paid-up capital of not less than seventy-five thousand dollars, which shall apply before the first day of July next for authority to become a national bank under the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June third, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and shall comply with all the requirements of said act, shall, if such bank be found by the Comptroller of the Currency to be in good standing and credit, receive such authority in preference to new associations applying for the same: Provided, That it shall be lawful for any bank or banking association organized under State laws, and having branches, the capital being joint and assigned to and used by the mother bank and branches in definite proportions, to become a national banking association in conformity with existing laws, and to retain and keep in operation its branches, or such one or more of them as it may elect to retain; the amount of the circulation redeemable at the mother bank and each branch to be regulated by the amount of capital assigned to and used by each.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all crude petroleum or rock-oil that may be produced and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a duty of one dollar on each and every barrel of not more than forty-five gallons; and all petroleum or rock-oil that may be in possession of the producers at the place of production on the day when this act takes effect, shall be held and treated as if produced on that day; and the said duty shall be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent of the well from which the petroleum or rock-oil has been produced, within ten days after the time of rendering the account required to be rendered by law of petroleum or rock-oil so chargeable with duty; and the said duty shall be a lien upon the same and on the well producing the same, with the buildings, fixtures, vessels, machinery, and tools, and on the lot or tract of land where the same may be, until the said duty shall be paid; and the person paying such duty, if other than the actual owner of said petroleum, shall have a lien on such petroleum for the repayment of the duties so advanced by him: Provided, That any person who shall produce petroleum or rock-oil, and use or refine the same without having paid the duty as aforesaid, shall, in addition to all other penalties and forfeitures, be liable to pay double the amount of duties as aforesaid thereon: Provided further, That when casks, barrels, or other vessels are used, holding more than forty-five gallons, the excess shall be paid for at the rate of one dollar for every forty-five gallons.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall be the owner of any well producing petroleum or rock-oil, or who shall have such well under his superintendence, either as agent for the owner or on his own account, and every person who shall use any well as aforesaid, either as owner, agent, or otherwise, shall, from day to day, make true and exact entry, or cause to be entered in a book to be kept for that purpose, the number of barrels of crude petroleum or rock-oil, barreled or removed for storage, or for sale, or for consumption; which book shall be open at all times when required for the inspection of the assessor, assistant assessor, collector, deputy collector, or inspector, who may take any memorandums or transcript thereof; and on the first, eleventh, and twenty-first days of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, the owner, agent, or superintendent shall render to the assessor of the district an account in duplicate of the number of barrels of petroleum or rock-oil sold, and of the number of barrels removed for consumption or sale or storage, not before accounted for.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That where ever, under the proviso to section one hundred and three, the addition to any fares shall amount to a sum involving the fraction of one cent, any person or company liable to the duty of two and one half per cent., as in said section provided, shall be authorized to add to such fare one cent in lieu of such fraction.

Laws of the United States.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That lucifer or friction matches, and cigar-lights and wax tapers, may be transferred, without payment of duty, directly from the place of manufacture to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with law and Treasury regulations; and upon the execution of such transportation bonds, or other security, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, said bonds to be taken by the collector in the district from which such removal is made, and may be withdrawn therefrom for consumption after affixing the stamps thereto, as provided by the act to which this act is an amendment, or may be removed therefrom for export to a foreign country without payment of duty or affixing stamps thereto, in conformity with the provisions of the act aforesaid, relating to the removal of distilled spirits, all the rules and regulations and conditions of which, as far as applicable, shall apply to lucifer or friction matches, cigar-lights, and wax tapers in bonded warehouse. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed upon any lucifer or friction matches, cigar-lights, or wax tapers upon which any excise duty has been paid, or stamps affixed, either before or after they have been placed in bonded warehouse.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That any person required by law to be licensed as a manufacturer of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, before said license is issued, shall give a bond to the United States in such sum as shall be required by the collector, and with one or more sureties to be approved by the collector, conditioned that he will comply with all the requirements of law, in regard to any persons, firms, companies, or corporations engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars; that he will not manufacture nor employ others to manufacture tobacco, snuff, or cigars without first obtaining the requisite permit for such manufacture; that he will not engage in any attempt by himself or by collusion with others to defraud the Government of any duty or tax on any manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars; that he will render truly and correctly all the returns, statements, and inventories prescribed for manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and will pay to the collector of the district all the duty or taxes which may or should be assessed and due on any tobacco, snuff, or cigars, so manufactured, and that he will not knowingly sell, purchase, or receive for sale any such tobacco, snuff, or cigars which has not been inspected, branded, or stamped, as required by law, or upon which the tax has not been paid.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That all persons and every person who shall engage or be concerned in the business of a lottery dealer without having first obtained a license so to do, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall forfeit and pay a penalty of one thousand dollars, to be assessed by the assessor of the proper district and collected as assessed taxes are collected, subject, nevertheless, to the provisions of law relating to erroneous assessments, and shall, on conviction by any court of competent jurisdiction, suffer imprisonment for a period not exceeding a year, at the discretion of the court. And it shall be the duty of all managers and proprietors, and their agents, to keep, or cause to be kept, just and true books of account wherein all their transactions shall be plainly and legibly set forth, which books of account shall at all reasonable times and hours be subject to the inspection of the assessor, assistant assessor, revenue agent, and inspector of the proper district; and any manager, proprietor, agent, or vender under this act, who shall refuse or prohibit such inspection of his or their books, as aforesaid, shall pay a penalty of one thousand dollars, or suffer imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year for every such offense.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the capital of any State bank or banking association which has ceased, or shall cease to exist, or which has been or shall be converted into a national bank, for all the purposes of the act to which this is an amendment, shall be assumed to be the capital as it existed immediately before such bank ceased to exist or was converted as aforesaid. And whenever the outstanding circulation of any bank, association, corporation, company, or person shall be reduced to an amount not exceeding five per centum of the chartered or declared capital existing at the time the same was issued, said circulation shall be free from taxation. And whenever any State bank or banking association has been converted into a national banking association, and such national banking association has assumed the liabilities of such State bank or banking association, including the redemption of its bills, such national banking association shall be held to make the required return and payment on the circulation outstanding, so long as such circulation shall exceed five per centum of the capital before such conversion of such State bank or banking association.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That in any port of the United States in which there is more than one collector of internal revenue, the Secretary of the Treasury shall designate one of said collectors to have charge of all matters relating to the exportation of articles subject to duty under the laws to provide internal revenue; and at such ports as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary there shall be an officer appointed by him to superintend all matters of exportation and drawback, under the direction of the collector, whose compensation therefor shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding, however, in any case, an annual rate of two thousand dollars, which, together with the office expenses of such superintendence, shall not be included in the maximum of the aggregate expenses of the office of the said collector. And all books, papers, and documents in the bureau of drawback in the different ports, relating to the drawback of duties paid under the internal revenue laws, shall be delivered to said collector of internal revenue.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That all provisions of any former act inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That no duty imposed by any previous act, which has become due or of which return has been or ought to be made, shall be remitted or released by this act, but the same shall be collected and paid, and all fines and penalties heretofore incurred shall be enforced and collected, and all offenses heretofore committed shall be punished as if this act had not been passed; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to make all necessary regulations and to prescribe all necessary forms and proceedings for the collection of such taxes and the enforcement of such fines and penalties for the execution of the provisions of this act.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the privilege of purchasing supplies of goods imported from foreign countries for the use of the United States, duty free, which now does or hereafter shall exist by provision of law, shall be extended, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to all articles of domestic production which are subject to tax by the provisions of this act.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force and effect on and after the first day of April, in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-five, unless otherwise provided by this act.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to inquire and report, at the earliest practicable moment, upon the subject of raising, by taxation, such revenue as may be necessary in order to supply the wants of the Government, having regard to, and including, the sources from which such revenue should be drawn, and the best and most efficient mode of raising the same, and to report the form of a bill; and that such commission have power to inquire into the manner and efficiency of the present and past methods of collecting the internal revenue, and to take testimony in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. And such commissioners shall receive for their services three hundred dollars a month for the time necessarily employed, and their necessary traveling expenses.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time prior to the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, assign to the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue such number of clerks as he may deem necessary, or the exigencies of the public service may require; and the privilege of franking all letters and documents pertaining to the duties of his office, and of receiving free of postage all such letters and documents, is hereby extended to said Commissioner.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXIX.—An Act to amend the several Acts heretofore passed to provide for the Enrolling and Calling out the National Forces, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the measure of allowance for pay for an officer's servant is the pay of a private soldier as fixed by law at the time; that no non-commissioned officer shall be detailed or employed to act as a servant, nor shall any private soldier be so detailed or employed except with his own consent; that for each soldier employed as a servant by any officer there shall be deducted from the monthly pay of such officer the full monthly pay and allowances of the soldier so employed; and that, including any soldier or soldiers so employed, no officer shall be allowed for any greater number of servants than is now provided by law, nor be allowed for any servant not actually and in fact in his employ.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That non-commissioned officers and privates in the volunteer service shall receive the same amount of clothing as non-commissioned officers and privates of the same arm of the regular Army.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if a soldier, discharged for wounds received in battle, die before receiving the bounty provided by the act of March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the employment of volunteers, and so forth," the bounty due shall be paid to the following persons, and in the order following, and to no other person, to wit: first, to the widow of such deceased soldier, if there be one; second, if there be no widow, then to the children of such deceased soldier, share and share alike; third, if such soldier left neither a widow, or child or children, then and in that case such bounty shall be paid to the following persons, provided they be residents of the United States, to wit: first, to his father; or if he shall not be living, or has abandoned the support of his family, then to the mother of such soldier; and if there be neither father nor mother as aforesaid, then such bounty shall be paid to the brothers and sisters of the deceased soldier, resident as aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every non-commissioned officer, private, or other person, who has been, or shall hereafter be, discharged from the Army of the United States by reason of wounds received in battle, on skirmish, on picket, or in action, or in the line of duty, shall be entitled to receive the same bounty as if he had served out his full term; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this are hereby repealed.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all persons of color who were enlisted and mustered into the military service of the United States in South Carolina, by and under the direction of Major General Hunter and Brigadier General Saxton, in pursuance of the authority from the Secretary of War, dated August twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, "that the persons so received into service, and their officers, to be entitled to and receive the same pay and rations as are allowed by law to other volunteers in the service;" and in every case where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that any regiment of colored troops has been mustered into the service of the United States, under any assurance by the President or the Secretary of War, that the non-commissioned officers and privates of such regiment should be paid the same as other troops of the same arm of the service, shall, from the date of their enlistment, receive the same pay and allowances as are allowed by law to other volunteers in the military service; and the Secretary of War shall make all necessary regulations to cause payment to be made in accordance herewith.

Laws of the United States.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to enlist or organize, out of troops already in the service, six regiments of volunteer engineers, to be organized in accordance with existing laws, to have the same pay and allowances of engineer troops of the regular Army, and to be subjected to the rules and articles of war.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to enlist two additional companies to be added to the regiment of volunteer engineers raised under the provisions of an act approved May twentieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An act to organize a regiment of veteran volunteers," and said regiment shall be considered one of the regiments authorized in the preceding section of this act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever a regiment in the regular Army is reduced below the minimum number, no officer shall be appointed in such a regiment beyond those necessary for the command of such reduced number.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That officers by brevet in the regular Army shall receive the same pay and allowance as brevet officers of the same grade or rank in the volunteer service, and no more.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the true construction of the sixth section of the "act respecting the organization of the Army, and for other purposes," approved August twenty-third, eighteen hundred and forty-two, and of all laws relating in any way to the allowance of double rations to officers, authorizes such allowance to the following officers, and to no others whatever: to the General-in-Chief commanding the armies of the United States; to each general officer commanding in chief a separate army actually in the field; to each general officer commanding a geographical division embracing one or more military departments; and to each officer commanding a military geographical department; and that any general order or regulation or usage allowing double rations to a chief of staff or any other officer than those above mentioned is illegal and void.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the bounty of one hundred dollars, provided by present laws to be paid to the heirs of volunteers killed in battle, shall be extended to the widow if living, or if she be dead to the children of any volunteer who shall have been or may be killed in the service, whether he shall have enlisted for two years or for a less period of time.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That in case any officer of the military or naval service who may be hereafter dismissed by authority of the President shall make an application in writing for a trial, setting forth under oath that he has been wrongfully and unjustly dismissed, the President shall, as soon as the necessities of the public service may permit, convene a court-martial to try such officer on the charges on which he was dismissed. And if such court-martial shall not award dismissal or death as the punishment of such officer, the order of dismissal shall be void. And if the court-martial aforesaid shall not be convened for the trial of such officer within six months from the presentation of his application for trial, the sentence of dismissal shall be void.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That where any revised enrollment in any congressional or draft district has been obtained or made prior to any actual drawing of names from the enrollment lists, the quota of such district may be adjusted and apportioned to such revised enrollment instead of being applied to or based upon the enrollment as it may have stood before the revision.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That hereafter all persons mustered in[to] the military or naval service, whether as volunteers, substitutes, representatives, or otherwise, shall be credited to the State and to the ward, township, precinct, or other enrollment sub-district where such persons belong by actual residence, (if such persons have an actual residence within the United States,) and where such persons were or shall be enrolled, (if liable to enrollment;) and it is hereby made the duty of the Provost Marshal General to make such rules and give such instructions to the several provost marshals, boards of enrollment, and mustering officers as shall be necessary for the faithful enforcement of the provisions of this section, to the end that fair and just credit shall be given to every section of the country: Provided, That in any call for troops hereafter no county, town, township, ward, precinct, or election district shall have credit except for men actually furnished on said call or the preceding call by said county, town, township, ward, precinct, or election district, and mustered into the military or naval service on the quota thereof.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That in computing quotas hereafter, credit shall be given to the several States, districts, and sub-districts for all men furnished from them, respectively, and not heretofore credited, during the present rebellion, for any period of service of not less than three months, calculating the number of days for which such service was furnished, and reducing the same to years: Provided, That such credits shall not be applied to the call for additional troops made by the President on the twenty-first day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That persons who have been, or may hereafter be, drafted, under the provisions of the several acts to which this is an amendment, for the term of one year, and who have actually furnished, or may actually furnish, acceptable substitutes (not liable to draft) for the term of three years, shall be exempt from military duty during the time for which such substitutes shall not be liable to draft, not exceeding the time for which such substitutes shall have been mustered into the service, anything in the act of February twenty-fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person who, for pay or profit, shall enlist, or cause to be enlisted, as a volunteer or substitute, any insane person, or convict, or person under indictment for a felony, or who is held to bail to answer for a felony, or person in a condition of intoxication, or a deserter from the military or naval service, or any minor between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years, without the consent of his parents or guardian, or any minor under the age of sixteen years, knowing him, in either case before mentioned, to be such, or who shall defraud or illegally deprive any volunteer or substitute of any portion of the State, local, or United States bounty, to which he may be entitled, shall, upon conviction in any court of competent jurisdiction, be fined not exceeding one thousand dollars, nor less than two hundred dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding two years and not less than three months, or both, in the discretion of the court aforesaid.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That any officer who shall muster into the military or naval service of the United States any deserter from said service, or insane person, or person in a condition of intoxication, or any minor between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years, without the consent of his parents or guardian, or any minor under the age of sixteen years, knowing him to be such, shall, upon conviction by any court-martial, be dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That in every case where a substitute is furnished to take the place of an enrolled or drafted man, and it is shown by evidence that shall be satisfactory to the Secretary of War that such substitute was, at the time of his enlistment, known by the party furnishing him to be non compos mentis, or in a condition of intoxication, or under conviction or indictment for any offense of the grade of felony at the common law, or to have been guilty of a previous act of desertion unsatisfied by pardon or punishment, or by reason of any existing infirmity or ailment, physically incapable of performing the ordinary duties of a soldier in actual service in the ranks, or minor between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years, without the consent of his parent or guardian, or a minor under the age of sixteen years, it shall be the duty of the Provost Marshal General, on advice of the fact, to report the same to the provost marshal of the proper district; and if such person so enlisted and incapable shall have been, since the passage of this act, mustered into the service as a substitute for a person liable to draft and not actually drafted, the name of the person so liable who furnished such substitute shall be again placed on the list, and he shall be subject to draft thereafter as though no such substitute had been furnished by him; and if such substitute so enlisted and incapable as aforesaid shall have been, since the passage of this act, mustered into the service as a substitute for a person actually drafted, then it shall be the duty of the Provost Marshal General to direct the provost marshal of the district immediately to notify the person who furnished such substitute that he is held to service in the place of such substitute, and he shall stand in the same relation and be subject to the same liability as before the furnishing of such substitute.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That in case any substitute shall desert from the Army, and it shall appear by evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of War that the party furnishing such substitute shall have, in any way, directly or indirectly, aided or abetted such desertion, or to have been privy to any intention on the part of such substitute to desert, then such person shall be immediately placed in the Army, and shall serve for the period for which he was liable to draft, such service to commence at the date of the desertion of the substitute.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service, or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the proclamation hereinafter mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any rights of citizens thereof; and all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service, and all persons who, being duly enrolled, shall depart the jurisdiction of the district in which he is enrolled, or go beyond the limits of the United States, with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service, duly ordered, shall be liable to the penalties of this section. And the President is hereby authorized and required forthwith, on the passage of this act, to issue his proclamation setting forth the provisions of this section, in which proclamation the President is requested to notify all deserters returning within sixty days as aforesaid that they shall be pardoned on condition of returning to their regiments and companies or to such other organizations as they may be assigned to, until they shall have served for a period of time equal to their original term of enlistment.

SEC. [22.] And be it further enacted, That the third section of the act entitled "An act [further] to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. [23.] And be it further enacted, That any person or persons enrolled in any sub-district may, after notice of a draft, and before the same shall have taken place, cause to be mustered into the service of the United States such number of recruits, not subject to draft, as they may deem expedient, which recruits shall stand to the credit of the persons thus causing them to be mustered in, and shall be taken as substitutes for such persons, or so many of them as may be drafted, to the extent of the number of such recruits, and in the order designated by the principals, at the time such recruits are thus as aforesaid mustered in.

SEC. [24.] And be it further enacted, That section fifteen of the act approved February twenty-fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after the words "any civil magistrate," the words "or any person authorized by law to administer oaths."

SEC. [25.] And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail one or more of the employees of the War Department for the purpose of administering the oaths required by law in the settlement of officers' accounts for clothing, camp, and garrison equipment, quartermaster's stores, and ordnance, which oaths shall be administered without expense to the parties taking them, and shall be as binding upon the persons taking the same, and if falsely taken, shall subject them to the same penalties, as if the same were administered by a magistrate or justice of the peace.

SEC. [26.] And be it further enacted, That acting assistant surgeons, contract surgeons, and surgeons and commissioners on the enrolling boards, while in the military service of the United States, shall hereafter be exempt from all liability to be drafted under the provisions of any act for enrolling and calling out the national forces.

SEC. [27.] And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall operate to postpone the pending draft, or interfere with the quotas assigned therefor.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXX.—An Act amendatory of certain Acts imposing Duties upon Foreign Importations.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section six of an act entitled "An act to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be amended, so that paragraphs second, third, and fourth, of section six of said act, shall read as follows:

Second. On all manufactures of cotton (except jeans, denims, drillings, bed-tickings, gingham, plaids, cottonades, pantaloons, stuff, and goods of like description) not bleached, colored, stained, painted, or printed, and not exceeding one hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, and exceeding in weight five ounces per square yard, five cents per square yard; if bleached, five cents and a half per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, five cents and a half per square yard, and, in addition thereto, ten per centum ad valorem. On finer and lighter goods of like description, not exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, unbleached, five cents per square yard; if bleached, five and a half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, five and a half cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, twenty per centum ad valorem. On goods of like description, exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, unbleached, five cents per square yard; if bleached, five and a half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, five and a half cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, twenty per centum ad valorem.

Third. On all cotton jeans, denims, drillings, bed-tickings, gingham, plaids, cottonades, pantaloons, stuffs, and goods of like description, or for similar use, if unbleached, and not exceeding one hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, and exceeding five ounces to the square yard, six cents per square yard; if bleached, six cents and a half per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, six cents and a half per square yard, and, in addition thereto, ten per centum ad valorem. On finer or lighter goods of like description, not exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, if unbleached, six cents per square yard; if bleached, six and a half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, six and a half cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, fifteen per centum ad valorem: Provided, That upon all plain woven cotton goods, not included in the foregoing schedule, unbleached, valued at over sixteen cents per square yard, bleached, valued at over twenty cents per square yard, colored, valued at over twenty-five cents per square yard, and cotton jeans, denims, and drillings, unbleached, valued at over twenty cents per square yard, and all other cotton goods of every description, the value of which shall exceed twenty-five cents per square yard, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of thirty-five per centum ad valorem: And provided further, That no cotton goods having more than two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, shall be admitted to a less rate of duty than is provided for goods which are of that number of threads.

Fourth. On spool thread of cotton, six cents per dozen spools, containing on each spool not exceeding one hundred yards of thread, and, in addition thereto, thirty per centum ad valorem; exceeding one hundred yards, for every additional hundred yards of thread on each spool or fractional part thereof, in excess of one hundred yards, six cents per dozen, and thirty-five per centum ad valorem. On cotton thread or yarn when advanced beyond single yarn, by twisting two or more strands together, if not wound upon spools, four (4) cents per skein or hank of eight hundred and forty (840) yards, and thirty per cent. ad valorem.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the day when this act takes effect, in addition to the duties heretofore imposed by law on the importation of the articles mentioned in this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say: On brandy, rum, gin, and whisky, and on cordials, liquors, [liqueurs], arrack, absynthe, and all other spirituous liquors and spirituous beverages, fifty cents per gallon, of first proof and less strength, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than [than] the strength of first proof. On spun silk for filling in skirts or cops, ten per centum ad valorem. On iron bars for railroads or inclined planes, ten cents per one hundred pounds. On wrought-iron tubes, one cent per pound.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after this act takes effect, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the importation of the articles mentioned in this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say: On cotton, five cents per pound. On illuminating oil and naphtha, benzine, and benzole, refined or produced from the distillation of coal, asphaltum, shale, peat, petroleum, or rock-oil, or other bituminous substances used for like purposes, forty cents per gallon. On crude petroleum, or rock-oil, twenty cents per gallon; on crude coal-oil, fifteen cents per gallon. On tobacco stems, fifteen cents per pound. On ready-made clothing of silk, or of which silk shall be a component material of chief value, sixty per centum ad valorem. On quicksilver, fifteen per centum ad valorem.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That section fifteen of an act entitled "An act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July fourteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to impose a tax or tonnage duty of thirty cents per ton, in lieu of "ten cents," as therein mentioned: Provided, That the receipts of vessels paying tonnage duty shall not be subject to the tax provided in section one hundred and three of "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, nor by any act amendatory thereof: Provided further, That no ship, vessel, or steamer, having a license to trade between different districts of the United States, or to carry on the bank, whale, or other fisheries, or on [nor] any ship, vessel, or steamer to or from any port or place in Mexico, the British provinces of North America, or any of the West India islands, or in all these trades, shall be required to pay the tonnage duty, contemplated by this act, more than once a year.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the term "statuary," as used in the laws now in force imposing duties on foreign importations, shall be understood to include professional productions of a statuary or of a sculptor only.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be hereafter collected and paid on all goods, wares, and merchandise of the growth or produce of countries [east] of the Cape of Good Hope, (except raw cotton and raw silk, as reeled from the cocoon, or not further advanced than tram, thrown, or organzine,) when imported from places west of the Cape of Good Hope, a duty of ten per centum ad valorem, in addition to the duties imposed on any such article when imported directly from the place or places of their growth or production.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where there is or shall be imposed any ad valorem rate of duty on any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States, and in all cases where the duty imposed by law shall be regulated by, or directed to be estimated or based upon, the value of the square yard, or of any specified quantity or parcel of such goods, wares, or merchandise, it shall be the duty of the collector, within whose district the same shall be imported or entered, to cause the actual market value, or wholesale price thereof, at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported into the United States, to be appraised, and such appraised value shall be considered the value upon which duty shall be assessed. That it shall be lawful for the owner, consignee, or agent of any goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall have been actually purchased, or procured otherwise than by purchase, at the time, and not afterwards, when he shall produce his original invoice, or invoices, to the collector and make and verify his written entry of his goods, wares, or merchandise, as provided by section thirty-six of the act of March two, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," to make such addition in the entry to the cost or value given in the invoice as in his opinion may raise the same to the actual market value or wholesale price of such goods, wares, or merchandise, at the period of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported; and it shall be the duty of the collector, within whose district the same may be imported or entered, to cause such actual market value or wholesale price to be appraised in accordance with the provisions of existing laws, and if such appraised value shall exceed by ten per centum or more the value so declared in the entry, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem on such appraised value: Provided, That the duty shall not be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice or entered value, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That the sections twenty-third and twenty-fourth of the act approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An act to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes," and all acts and parts of acts requiring duties to be assessed upon commissions, brokerage, costs of transportation, shipment, transshipment, and other like costs and charges incurred in placing any goods, wares, or merchandise on shipboard, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of an act entitled "An act to authorize protection to be given to citizens of the United States who may discover deposits of guano," approved August eighteen, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, as prohibits the export thereof, is hereby suspended in relation to all persons who have complied with the provisions of section second of said act for two years from and after July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect on and after the first day [of] April, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That so much of sections thirty-nine, forty, forty-one, forty-two, forty-three, and forty-four of the act entitled "An act to regulate the [collection of] duties on imports and tonnage," approved March second, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine, as requires the branding or marking and certifying of casks, chests, vessels, and cases containing distilled spirits, or teas, be, and the same is hereby, revived, to be executed under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

and hemp machinery and steam agricultural machinery, as designated in section 21 [twenty-one] of the act "to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, may be imported free from duty for one year from the passage of this act.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That in all proceedings brought by the United States in any court for due recovery as well of duties upon imports alone as of penalties for the non-payment thereof, the judgment shall recite that the same is rendered for duties, and such judgment, interest, and cost shall be payable in the coin by law receivable for duties, and the execution issued on such judgment shall set forth that the recovery is for duties, and shall require the marshal to satisfy the same in the coin by law receivable for duties; and in case of levy upon and sale of the property of the judgment debtor, the marshal shall refuse payment from any purchaser at such sale in any other money than that specified in the execution.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the eighth section of the act of March twenty-third, [eight] eighteen hundred and fifty-four, "to extend the warehousing system by establishing private bonded warehouses, and for other purposes," which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, in case of the actual injury or destruction of goods, wares, or merchandise by accidental fire or other casualty, while in warehouse under bond, &c., to abate or refund the duties paid or accruing thereon, be extended so as to include goods, wares, or merchandise injured or destroyed in like manner while in the custody of the officers of the customs, and not in bond, and also to goods, wares, and merchandise so injured or destroyed after their arrival within the limits of any port of entry of the United States, and before the same have been bonded [landed] under the suspension [supervision] of the officers of the customs: Provided, That this act shall apply only to cases arising from and after its passage, and to cases where the duties have not already been paid.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXXI.—An Act making Appropriations for the Support of the Army for the year ending thirtieth June, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the support of the Army for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-six:

For the purchase of cavalry and artillery horses, twenty-one million dollars.

For transportation of officers' baggage, five hundred thousand dollars.

For transportation of the Army, including the baggage of the troops when moving, either by land or water; of clothing, camp, and garrison equipage, from the depots at Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and New York to the several posts and Army depots, and from those depots to the troops in the field; and of subsistence stores from the places of purchase, and from the places of delivery under contract, to such places as the circumstances of the service may require them to be sent; of ordnance, or ordnance stores, and small-arms, from foundries and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; for the purchase and hire of horses, mules, oxen, and harness, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, and drays, and of ships and other sea-going vessels, and boats required for the transportation of supplies and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters; transportation of funds for the pay and other disbursing departments; the expense of sailing public transports on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific; and for procuring water at such posts as, from their situation, require it to be brought from a distance; and for clearing roads, and removing obstructions from roads, harbors, and rivers, to the extent which may be required for the actual operations of the troops in the field, thirty million dollars.

For the hire or commutation of quarters for officers on military duty; hire of quarters for troops; of storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores; of grounds for summer cantonments; for the construction of temporary huts, hospitals, and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts, five million dollars.

For heating and cooking stoves, one hundred thousand dollars.

For constructing and extending the telegraph for military purposes, and for expenses in operating the same, five hundred thousand dollars.

For supplies, transportation, and care of prisoners of war, one million dollars.

For clothing for the Army, camp and garrison equipage, and for expenses of offices and arsenals, fifty million dollars.

For contingencies of the Army, four hundred thousand dollars.

For the medical and hospital department, six million dollars.

For expenses of the Commanding General's office, ten thousand dollars.

For the secret service, one hundred thousand dollars.

For armament of fortifications, three million five hundred thousand dollars.

For the current expenses of the ordnance service, one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

For ordnance, ordnance stores, and supplies, including horses, and the purchase and manufacture of Army accouterments and horse equipments for volunteers and regulars, twenty million dollars.

For the manufacture of arms at the national armory, three million five hundred thousand dollars.

For repairs, improvements, and new machinery at the national armory, one hundred thousand dollars.

For the purchase of gunpowder and lead, two million five hundred thousand dollars.

For repairs and improvements at arsenals, including new and additions to present buildings, and machinery, tools, and fixtures, five hundred thousand dollars.

For signal service of the Army, one hundred thousand dollars.

For salaries of two clerks in the signal office, two thousand eight hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the current fiscal year, for ordnance, ordnance stores, and supplies, including the purchase and manufacture of arms, accouterments, and horse equipments for volunteers and regulars, the sum of seven millions of dollars is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, and during the continuance of the present rebellion, the commutation price of officers' subsistence shall be fifty cents per ration: Provided, That said increase shall not apply to the commutation price of the rations of any officer above the rank of brevet brigadier general, or of any officer entitled to commutation for fuel or quarters.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all officers of volunteers now in commission, below the rank of brigadier general, who shall continue in the military service to the close of the war, shall be entitled to receive, upon being mustered out of said service, three months' pay proper.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That commissioned officers of the Army, serving in the field, shall hereafter be permitted to purchase rations for their own use, on credit, from any commissary of subsistence, at cost prices, and the amount due for rations so purchased shall be reported monthly to the Paymaster General, to be deducted from the payment next following such purchase. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such orders and regulations as he may deem best calculated to insure the proper observance hereof.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause tobacco to be furnished to the enlisted men of the Army at cost prices, exclusive of the cost of transportation, in such quantities as they may require, not exceeding sixteen ounces per month, and the amount due therefor shall be deducted from their pay in the same manner as at present provided for the settlement of clothing accounts.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the amount hereinbefore appropriated for the pay of the Army, the sum of thirty-six millions of dollars is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXXII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to provide a National Currency, secured by a Pledge of United States Bonds, and to provide for the Circulation and Redemption thereof."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section twenty-one of said act be so amended that said section shall read as follows:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That upon the transfer and delivery of bonds to the Treasurer, as provided in the foregoing section, the association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as hereinafter provided, equal in amount to ninety per centum of the current market value of the United States bonds so transferred and delivered, but not exceeding ninety per centum of the amount of said bonds at the par value thereof, if bearing interest at a rate not less than five per centum per annum; and the amount of said circulating notes to be furnished to each association shall be in proportion to its paid-up capital as follows, and no more: To each association whose capital shall not exceed five hundred thousand dollars, ninety per centum of such capital; to each association whose capital exceeds five hundred thousand dollars, but does not exceed one million dollars, eighty per centum of such capital; to each association whose capital exceeds one million dollars, but does not exceed three millions of dollars, seventy-five per centum of such capital; to each association whose capital exceeds three millions of dollars, sixty per cent. of such capital. And that one hundred and fifty millions of dollars of the entire amount of circulating notes authorized to be issued shall be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population, and the remainder shall be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such States, District, and Territories.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXXIII.—An Act to prevent the Enlistment of Persons charged with Crime in the District of Columbia, as Substitute[s] or as Volunteers in the Army or Navy, and to prevent Frauds at the District Jail, in the city of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any person, with knowledge of the fact, to present or offer to any recruiting agent or officer, or any muster-in officer in the United States military or naval service, either as a volunteer or as a substitute for any person, any person charged with the commission of any criminal offense, and confined or held on bail for the trial of such offense, within the District of Columbia; and it shall in like manner be unlawful for any person, in any way or manner, to abet, aid, or assist in procuring the offer or acceptance of any person so charged or held for trial, or released on bail and awaiting trial, either as a volunteer or as a substitute for any person drafted or liable to draft in the military or naval service of the United States, whether the person so drafted or liable to draft shall be a resident of the District of Columbia, or shall reside elsewhere. And any person who shall knowingly offend against the provisions of this section, or either of such provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall upon conviction thereof, before a court of competent jurisdiction in said district, be punished by a fine of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars, and not more than one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment in the district prison for a term not less than six months nor more than one year.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any officer of the district jail of the District of Columbia, or any guard thereof, or any attaché or employé connected with said jail, who shall demand or directly or indirectly receive, any compensation, fee, reward, or gratuity for any information given in respect to any prisoner confined therein, or awaiting trial upon bail, or for any service, assistance, or influence rendered, given, or exerted, with any view, intent, or purpose of having such person thus charged or held for trial, or held in [on] bail to await trial, taken, offered, or used either as a volunteer or as a substitute for any other in the military or naval service, or who shall corruptly receive, for any act done by virtue of his office or employment, any fee, compensation, reward, or gratuity, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor [misdemeanor] [and] shall on conviction thereof in any district court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by a fine of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars, and not more than one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment in the district prison for a term not less than three months nor more than one year.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXXIV.—An Act supplementary to the several Acts relating to Pensions.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no invalid pensioner now or hereafter in the service of the United States shall be entitled to draw a pension for any period of time during which he is or shall be entitled to the full pay or salary which an able-bodied person discharging like duties to the Government is allowed by law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That acting assistant or contract surgeons disabled by any wound received or disease contracted while actually performing the duties of assistant surgeons or acting assistant surgeons, with any military forces in the field or in transitu, shall be entitled to the benefits of the pension laws in the same manner as if they had actually been mustered into the service with the rank of "assistant surgeon," and the widows, minor children, or the dependents of acting assistant surgeons dying while performing the duty aforesaid, shall in like manner be entitled to the same benefits of the pension laws as if the deceased had been actually mustered into the service as assistant surgeons.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons now by law entitled to a less pension than hereafter specified who shall have lost one foot and one hand in the military service of the United States, and in the line of his [their] duty, shall be entitled to twenty dollars per month.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or other person named in the first section of an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July fourteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, has died since the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, or shall hereafter die by reason of any wound received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States, and in the line of duty, his widow, or if there be no widow, or in case of her death or marriage, without payment to her of any part of the pension hereinafter mentioned, his child or children, under sixteen years of age, shall be entitled to receive the same pension as the husband or father would have been entitled to under said act, had he been totally disabled, to commence from the death of the husband or father, and to continue to the widow during her widowhood, or to the child or children until they severally attain to the age of sixteen years, and no longer: Provided, That when such pension has been, or shall hereafter be, paid to the widow, such child or children shall only be entitled to receive the pension, to commence from the death or marriage of such widow and [to] continue as aforesaid: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal or modify the tenth section of an act entitled "An act supplementary to 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two," approved July fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and said section is hereby declared to be in full force and effect in all cases arising under this act to which said section is applicable, saving and excepting such cases as are embraced in the preceding proviso.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXXV.—An Act to provide for a Chief of Staff to the Lieutenant General commanding the Armies of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a Chief of Staff to the Lieutenant General commanding the armies of the United States, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier general in the United States Army.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXXVI.—An Act regulating Proceedings in Criminal Cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every grand jury impaneled before any district or circuit court of the United States to inquire into and presentment make of public offenses against the United States, committed or triable within the district for which the court is holden, shall consist of not less than sixteen and not exceeding twenty-three persons. If of the persons summoned less than sixteen attend, they shall be placed on the grand jury, and the court shall order the marshal to summon, either immediately or for a day fixed, from the body of the district, and not from the bystanders, a sufficient number of persons to complete the grand jury. And whenever a challenge to an individual grand juror is allowed, and there are not other jurors in attendance sufficient to complete the grand jury, the court shall make a like order to the marshal to summon a sufficient number of persons for that purpose. No indictment shall be found, nor shall any presentment be made, without the concurrence of at least twelve grand jurors. From the persons summoned and accepted as grand jurors, the court shall appoint the foreman, who shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations to witnesses appearing before the grand jury.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when the offense charged be treason or a capital offense, the defendant shall be entitled to twenty and the United States to five peremptory challenges. On a trial for any other offense in which the right of peremptory challenge now exists, the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to two peremptory challenges. All challenges, whether to the array or panel or to individual jurors for cause or favor, shall be tried by the court without the aid of triers.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in every case where any person convicted of any offense against the United States shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a period longer than one year, it shall be lawful for the court by which the sentence is passed to order the same to be executed in any State prison or penitentiary within the district or State where such court is held, the use of which prison or penitentiary is allowed by the Legislature of such State for such purposes; and the expenses attendant upon the execution of such sentence shall be paid by the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That issues of fact in civil cases in any circuit court of the United States may be tried and determined by the court without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties, or their attorneys of record, file a stipulation in writing with the clerk of the court waiving a jury. The finding of the court upon the facts, which finding may be either general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury. The rulings of the court in the court [causc] in the progress of the trial, when excepted to at the time, may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, or upon appeal, provided the rulings be duly presented by a bill of exceptions. When the finding is special, the review may also extend to the determination of the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect on the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXXVII.—An Act further to amend an Act entitled "An Act for the Collection of direct Taxes in the insurrectionary Districts within the United States, and for other purposes," approved June seven, eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in any case in which a sale of lands or tenements has been or shall be made by a board of tax commissioners, appointed pursuant to the act of which this is an amendment, and a certificate of sale issued by the board to the purchaser or purchasers of said lands or tenements, it shall and may be lawful for the tax commissioners to issue, in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, a writ, directed to the marshal of the district in which said lands or tenements are situated, commanding him to put the said purchaser or purchasers forthwith into possession of the said lands or tenements, and to make return of his proceedings under the said writ within thirty days to the commissioners, who shall keep a record of their proceedings in the matter, and who may, in case of any failure on the part of the said marshal to execute the first writ, issue alias and pluries writs, as the circumstances may to [them] seem to require. In case the marshal of the district shall be unable, either by himself or by deputy, to execute such writ, or in case there shall be no marshal of the United States within the said district at the time of the issuing of said writ, the same may be executed and returned by any fit person, to be specially appointed by the said board of tax commissioners for the purpose, which appointment shall be in writing and indorsed in the said writ: Provided, That where the lands or tenements so sold shall, at the time of such sale, be occupied by the United States authorities for hospital or other purposes, the issuing of such writ shall be suspended during such occupancy, and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands or tenements shall be entitled to and receive such rent or compensation for the use of such lands or tenements as the Secretary of the Treasury, under regulations prescribed by him, shall order or direct.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That after the time allowed for the redemption of any lands or tenements which have been or shall be sold by a board of tax commissioners shall have passed, and after the purchase-money shall have been fully paid, the President is authorized and required to cause a patent or patents to be issued to any such person as may be the bona fide purchaser, owner, assignee, or transferee of such lands or tenements under and by virtue of any certificates of sale, or under and by virtue of any assignment or transfer of such certificate: Provided, That in case of an assignment or transfer of a certificate of sale, the person applying for such patent shall give satisfactory proof to the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the preceding transfers or assignments.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That a majority of a board of tax commissioners shall have full authority to transact all business and to perform all duties required by law to be performed by such board, and no proceeding of any board of tax commissioners shall be void or invalid in consequence of the absence of any one of said commissioners.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any lien creditor (being a loyal citizen of the United States from the commencement of this rebellion, or alien subject of a friendly nation who shall not have taken part against the United States in this rebellion) of a person whose lands or tenements shall have been sold by a board of tax commissioners and not redeemed, shall, after the period of redemption has elapsed, be entitled to payment out of the balance of the proceeds of sale of such lands and tenements, after the same shall have been paid into the Treasury of the United States, of the amount of his lien, if a sufficient sum shall be left for such purpose, after the payment of all claims of the United States, together with the costs and expenses of sale, and the payment of all prior liens, under such rules and regulations, and after exhibiting such proof of his right, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That each board of tax commissioners shall file in the Department of the Treasury a transcript of its proceedings from time to time as the said proceedings shall occur, and duplicates of all orders, resolutions, documents and papers, drafts, plats, and maps of surveys, made or issued by them, and as often and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; and copies of any such orders, resolutions, documents, papers, or proceedings, duly certified to be full and correct copies, under the hand of the said Secretary or of the officer having custody of the said transcripts and duplicates, under the seal of the Treasury, shall be evidence with the same effect as the originals.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the expenses caused by or incident to the proceedings of any board of tax commissioners shall be paid by the commissioners out of the proceeds of the sales which have been or shall be made by them of any lands or tenements: Provided, however, That the bills of such expenses shall be first submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That in any case in which lands shall be redeemed after sale made by the board of commissioners, and after the money received by them on the sale of such lands has been paid into the Treasury, by the owner complying with all the provisions of the law relating to redemption necessary to be complied with on his part, the said board shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the fact that such lands have been redeemed, the amount of the purchase-money paid by the purchaser, and when the said purchase-money was paid, together with such other circumstances as the Secretary, by general regulation or special instructions shall require, and the Secretary, on being satisfied that the lands have been duly redeemed, shall repay, by draft drawn on the Treasury of the United States, the said purchaser the principal and interest of the said purchase-money; and the purchaser shall forthwith deliver possession to the owner so redeeming as aforesaid: Provided, however, That no owner shall be entitled to redeem unless, in addition to the oath prescribed by existing laws, he shall swear that he has not taken part with the insurgents in the present rebellion, or in any way given them aid or comfort, and shall satisfy the board of commissioners that the said oath is true: Provided, also, That a tenant, at sufferance or at will, shall not be allowed to redeem, nor shall a tenant for years be allowed to redeem, unless he shall satisfy the board of commissioners, in addition to the other requirements of the law, that the owner of the reversionary estate has been loyal and not in any manner engaged in this rebellion, nor in giving aid or comfort to rebels.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That when lands, tenements, parcels, or lots of land, which have been selected under direction of the President for Government use, or which have been purchased at any sale made by a board of tax commissioners for the United States, have been entered upon by persons claiming preemption rights therein, with the consent or by the authority of the board of tax commissioners, and in accordance with instructions heretofore issued by the President of the United States, such persons shall be taken and deemed to have acquired rights of preemption in said lands; and all certificates that have been issued or that shall hereafter be issued by the said board of commissioners to such persons shall be valid and effectual, as though issued pursuant to the act of which this is amendatory.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That boards of tax commissioners shall give such notice, by advertisements, of sales of lands to be made by them, by authority of law, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall order and direct.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That section seven of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes,'" be amended by striking therefrom the following words, that is to say: "or request the same to be struck off to a purchaser for a less sum than two thirds of the assessed value of said [several] lots or parcels of ground."

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That in case application is made to pay tax on a part of any tract or tracts, lot or lots of land embraced in one valuation, it shall be competent for the commissioners, whether the valuation shall have been made by them or by the State authorities, to apportion such valuation and tax in such manner as they may deem just and reasonable, and the tax so apportioned and fixed shall be a lien upon the different parts or parcels, the same as if each had been thus originally valued or assessed.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That each tax commissioner is hereby authorized and empowered to administer oaths or affirmations in all cases where the same may be required under this act, and any person who shall willfully take a false oath or affirmation in any such case shall, upon conviction thereof, be liable to the punishment and penalties provided by the laws of the United States for the crime of perjury, and shall moreover forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That purchasers at any sale, persons redeeming or in whose behalf writs of possession may be issued, shall pay to the board of tax commissioners for their use the sum of two dollars for each certificate of sale, certificate of redemption, or writ, delivered, provided that the fees thus received, together with the salary of the commissioners for any district, shall not exceed the sum of four thousand dollars to each of said commissioners, and that any excess that may be received over that amount shall be applied in payment of clerks or other persons employed by said commissioners in pursuance of this act, so far as may be necessary, and the balance, if any, paid as the proceeds of the sales of lands sold by them are required to be paid.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That any board of tax commissioners may employ the requisite number of clerks, surveyors, and assistants, who shall receive such compensation as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and that any clerk appointed by said board may be specially empowered by the said Secretary to receive and collect moneys due for direct taxes, and rents for lands leased, and to pay them over to the said board: Provided, however, That he first give security in such sum and with such conditions as the said Secretary may direct, with sureties to be approved by him; and each tax commissioner shall be held to have entered on the discharge of his duties when he shall have given approved security, taken the required oath, received his commission, and reported at the office of the Secretary of the Treasury for duty, unless the said Secretary shall in any particular case direct otherwise.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That where lands or tenements have been, or shall hereafter be, sold under the provisions of the several acts of Congress relating to the sale of lands for direct taxes in insurrectionary districts, in tracts which, at the time of sale, were held by two or more freehold owners, in severalty, any one of these owners, being otherwise entitled to redeem, shall be allowed to redeem for the piece or parcel of land held by him as a freehold owner, as aforesaid, on paying his proportionable part of the tax, penalty, costs, expenses, and interest—the said proportionable part to be ascertained by the said commissioners. And it shall be optional with the purchaser either to retain the residue of the tract purchased, after a redemption of a part, or to surrender his certificate of purchase to the commissioners, and receive back from them the amount of the purchase-money paid, with interest: and CHAP. LXXXVIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to aid in the Construction of a Railroad and Telegraph Line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the Use of the same for Postal, Military, and other Purposes," approved July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and to amend an Act amendatory thereof, approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section ten of said act of July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be so modified and amended as to allow the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, of California, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, and all other companies provided for in the said act of the second of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, to issue their six per centum thirty years' bonds, interest payable in any lawful money of the United States, upon their separate roads. And the said companies are hereby authorized to issue, respectively, their bonds to the extent of one hundred miles in advance of a continuous completed line of construction.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the assignment made by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California to the Western Pacific Railroad Company of said State, of the right to construct all that portion of said railroad and telegraph from the city of San José to the city of Sacramento is hereby ratified and confirmed to the said Western Pacific Railroad Company, with all the privileges and benefits of the several acts of Congress relating thereto, and subject to all the conditions thereof: Provided, That the time within which the said Western Pacific Railroad Company shall be required to construct the first twenty miles of their said road shall be one year from the first day of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, and that the entire road shall be completed from San José to Sacramento, connecting at the latter point with the said Central Pacific railroad, within four years thereafter.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. LXXXIX.—An Act relating to the Postal Laws.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all domestic letters, except letters lawfully franked, and duly certified letters of soldiers and mariners in the service of the United States, which are deposited for mailing in any post office of the United States, on which the postage is unpaid, shall be sent by the postmaster to the dead letter office in Washington; and all letters deposited for mailing, paid only in part, shall be forwarded to destination, charged with the unpaid rate, to be collected on delivery.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the relief of postmasters who have been robbed by confederate forces or rebel guerrillas," approved April twenty-nine, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be, and the same are hereby, extended to cases of loyal postmasters where, by reason of the presence of armed forces, a post office is destroyed and the postmaster loses the fixtures and furniture or postage stamps, and stamped envelopes; and also to cases where such losses are occasioned by armed forces other than those of the so-called confederate States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the items of rent, fuel, light, and clerks enumerated in the fifth section of the act approved July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow, at his discretion, out of the revenues of the office at New York, and of offices of the first, second, third, and fourth classes, a just and reasonable sum for the necessary cost, in whole or in part, as well of the foregoing items, as of furniture, stationery, printing, and other items of expenditure required at offices of those classes, to be adjusted upon a satisfactory exhibit of the facts; and that he be authorized to pay, out of the proceeds of the money-order business, the cost of stationery and such other incidental expenses as are necessary for the transaction of that business.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to the Post Office Department," approved March three, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize the Postmaster General to allow for the publication, in newspapers, of the list of non-delivered letters at any post office, compensation at a rate not to exceed two cents for each letter so advertised.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the seventeenth section of the act entitled "An act to establish salaries for postmasters, and for other purposes," approved July one, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to restore, from the date of its passage, to the special agent of the Post Office Department in the Pacific States and Territories, his regular salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum, under the act of March two, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, with an allowance, in addition thereto, of a sum not exceeding five dollars per diem, to provide for his actual traveling and incidental expenses while actively employed in the service. And the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to appoint an additional special agent for the Pacific States and Territories, and two additional special agents to superintend postal matters connected with the railway mail service of the United States, who shall receive the same salary and per diem allowance for traveling and incidental expenses, to be paid out of the appropriation for mail transportation.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That hereafter special agents of the Post Office Department, other than those appointed for the Pacific States and Territories, or those appointed under the authority of the preceding section of this act to superintend postal matters connected with the railway service of the United States, shall be allowed for their necessary traveling and incidental expenses, while actively employed in the service, a sum not exceeding five dollars per diem.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses, the sum of ten thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be required, for defraying the necessary expense of preparing and publishing a set of post-route maps arranged by States and groups of States, and showing all the permanent mail routes, distances, and post offices thereon in the United States, with other statistical information.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of assorting and distributing letters and other mail matter in railway post offices, the Postmaster General may, from time to time, appoint clerks, who shall be paid out of the appropriation for mail transportation: Provided, That the salary of each head clerk so appointed and employed, shall not exceed fourteen hundred dollars per annum, and that the salary of other clerks shall not exceed twelve hundred dollars each per annum.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the fourth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-one," approved June fifteen, eighteen hundred and sixty, be and the same are hereby modified so as to authorize the Postmaster General to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports, or between ports of the United States, touching at a foreign port, by steamship, allowing and paying therefor, if by an American vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mails so conveyed.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That no steamship or other vessel departing from the United States for a foreign port or ports, shall be permitted to receive on board, or convey any letters or letter packets originating in the United States, which have not been regularly posted at, and received from, the post office at the port of departure; and it shall be the duty of the collector or other officer of the port empowered to grant clearances of vessels, to require as a condition of clearance, from the master or commander of such steamship or vessel, an oath or affirmation that he has not received on board his ship or vessel, and has not under his care or within his control, and will not receive and convey any letters or letter packets addressed to a foreign country, except as herein-after excepted, which hire have not been delivered to him from the post office at the port of departure: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any letters or letter packets which relate to the cargo and are addressed to the owner or consignee of such steamship or other vessel, or to any letters or packets which are inclosed in a United States stamped envelope of a denomination sufficient in amount to cover the United States postage legally chargeable thereon, if such letters or packets had been posted and transmitted by the regular mail.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to establish a postal money-order system," approved May seventeen, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, or in any other act, shall be so construed as to prevent deputy postmasters at money-order or other offices from depositing in the national banks designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as public depositories, to their own credit as deputy postmasters, money orders, or other funds in their charge, under the direction of the Postmaster General, nor to prevent their negotiating drafts, orders, or other evidences of debt through these banks, as they may be instructed and required by the Postmaster General.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the balance which may remain unexpended of the appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars to meet any deficiencies in the proceeds of the money-order system during the present fiscal year, under the thirteenth section of the act approved May seventeen, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, may be used, as far as may be necessary, to supply deficiencies in the proceeds of the aforesaid system during the fiscal year commencing July first, eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall willfully and maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter-box, pillar-box, or other receiving-boxes established by authority of the Postmaster General of the United States for the safe deposit of matter for the mails and for delivery; or shall willfully aid and assist in injuring, tearing down, or destroying any such box or boxes, every such offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than one hundred, nor more than one thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not less than one year, nor more than three years, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense. And if any clerk or other person employed in any of the departments of the Post Office establishment shall willfully and unlawfully remove from any letter posted at or received in any post office or branch post office, established by authority of the Postmaster General of the United States, any postage-stamp or stamps affixed thereto in payment of postage, every such offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offense, be fined not more than one hundred dollars, or imprisoned not more than six months, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the yearly advertisement for proposals to carry the mails of the United States shall be published hereafter for a period of six weeks in one or more, but not to exceed five, newspapers, printed in the State or Territory where the mail service is to be performed, one of which shall be printed at the seat of government of such State or Territory.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to the Post Office Department," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, shall be so construed as to repeal or modify the second section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-one," for the delivery of letters and other mail matter from post offices where the system of free delivery by carriers has not been established: Provided, nevertheless, and it is hereby further enacted, That the system of free delivery shall be established in every place containing a population of fifty thousand within the delivery of the office thereof, and at such other places as the Postmaster General in his judgment shall direct: And provided further, That the prepayment postage on drop-letters in all places where free delivery is not established shall be one cent only.

Laws of the United States.

38TH CONG... 2D SESS.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That no obscene book, pamphlet, picture, print, or other publication of a vulgar and indecent character, shall be admitted into the mails of the United States; any person or persons who shall deposit or cause to be deposited, in any post office or branch post office of the United States, for mailing or for delivery, an obscene book, pamphlet, picture, print, or other publication, knowing the same to be of a vulgar and indecent character, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being duly convicted thereof, shall for every such offense be fined not more than five hundred dollars, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XC.—An Act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established in the War Department, to continue during the present war of rebellion, and for one year thereafter, a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to which shall be committed, as hereinafter provided, the supervision and management of all abandoned lands, and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States, or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the head of the bureau and approved by the President. The said bureau shall be under the management and control of a Commissioner to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose compensation shall be three thousand dollars per annum, and such number of clerks as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of War, not exceeding one chief clerk, two of the fourth class, two of the third class, and five of the first class. And the Commissioner and all persons appointed under this act, shall, before entering upon their duties, take the oath of office prescribed in an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and the Commissioner and the chief clerk shall, before entering upon their duties, give bonds to the Treasurer of the United States, the former in the sum of fifty thousand dollars, and the latter in the sum of ten thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties respectively, with securities to be approved as sufficient by the Attorney General, which bonds shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit for the benefit of any injured party upon any breach of the conditions thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel, as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an assistant commissioner for each of the States declared to be in insurrection, not exceeding ten in number, who shall, under the direction of the Commissioner, aid in the execution of the provisions of this act; and he shall give a bond to the Treasurer of the United States, in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, in the form and manner prescribed in the first section of this act.

Each of said commissioners shall receive an annual salary of two thousand five hundred dollars in full compensation for all his services. And any military officer may be detailed and assigned to duty under this act without increase of pay or allowances. The Commissioner shall, before the commencement of each regular session of Congress, make full report of his proceedings with exhibits of the state of his accounts to the President, who shall communicate the same to Congress, and shall also make special reports whenever required to do so by the President or either House of Congress; and the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly reports of their proceedings to the Commissioner, and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, shall have authority to set apart, for the use of loyal refugees and freedmen, such tracts of land within the insurrectionary States as shall have been abandoned, or to which the United States shall have acquired title by confiscation or sale, or otherwise, and to every male citizen, whether refugee or freedman, as aforesaid, there shall be assigned not more than forty acres of such land, and the person to whom it was so assigned shall be protected in the use and enjoyment of the land for the term of three years at an annual rent not exceeding six per centum upon the value of such land, as it was appraised by the State authorities in the year eighteen hundred and sixty, for the purpose of taxation, and in case no such appraisal can be found, then the rental shall be based upon the estimated value of the land in said year, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may by regulation prescribe. At the end of said term, or at any time during said term, the occupants of any parcels so assigned may purchase the land and receive such title thereto as the United States can convey, upon paying therefor the value of the land, as ascertained and fixed for the purpose of determining the annual rent aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCI.—An Act to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the Relief of the totally disabled Officers and Men of the Volunteer Forces of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Ulysses S. Grant, David G. Farragut, Hannibal Hamlin, Andrew Johnson, Salmon P. Chase, Edwin M. Stanton, Gideon Welles, John A. Dix, George Bancroft, William T. Sherman, John A. Andrew, Andrew G. Curtin, Oliver P. Morton, Benjamin F. Butler, George G. Meade, John Brough, Nathaniel P. Banks, Joseph Hooker, Samuel R. Curtis, Richard J. Oglesby, David Todd, Henry Ward Beecher, Ambrose E. Burnside, John A. Logan, Daniel S. Dickinson, William A. Buckingham, Carl Schurz, Oliver O. Howard, Hamilton Fish, Frank Sigel, Francis Wayland, Austin Blair, Thomas C. Fletcher, Robert Breckinridge, Lovell H. Rousseau, Horace Greeley, George H. Stuart, Joseph Henry, John G. Barnard, Henry J. Raymond, William B. Astor, James Gordon Bennett, H. W. Halleck, William E. Dodge, William M. Everts, James T. Brady, Gerritt Smith, Reuben E. Fenton, Bellamy Storer, George P. McIlvaine, Galusha A. Grow, Henry W. Bellows, J. S. C. Abbott, Jay Cooke, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Israel Washburn, jr., Ichabod Goodwin, Frederick Smyth, John Z. Goodrich, Charles Henry Davis, William Claflin, J. Wiley Edmonds, Amos A. Lawrence, Edward S. Tobey, Thomas Russell, Charles G. Loring, George B. Upton, Charles G. Greene, J. M. S. Williams, George G. Stannard, Henry M. Rice, Grenville M. Dodge, Morton McMichael, Thomas Webster, James M. Scovel, Nathaniel B. Baker, Richard J. Field, Henry C. Carey, John W. Forney, Bishop M. Simpson, G. S. Griffith, William Henry Channing, James E. Yeatman, Dwight Durkee, A. T. Stewart, Barnabas Hobbs, Montgomery Blair, Joseph R. Barnes, E. B. Ward, Henry Benham, Frank Moore, Alfred Lee, Edward Solomon, Thomas C. Bryan, B. B. French, Samuel J. Crawford, James T. Pratt, Alfred H. Terry, Edward Tompkins, Moses F. Odell, and their successors, duly chosen, are hereby constituted and created a body-corporate in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation hereby constituted shall consist of one hundred members. They shall have power to fill all vacancies created by death, resignation, or otherwise, and to make by-laws, rules, and regulations: Provided, That such by-laws, rules, and regulations are not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the business of said corporation shall be managed by a board of twelve directors, who shall elect from their number a president, two vice presidents, and a secretary; and seven of the directors, of whom the president or one of the vice presidents shall be one, shall form a quorum for the transaction of business at any special meeting of the board of directors.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the board of directors shall have authority to procure for early use, at a suitable place, a site for a military asylum for officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States who have been or may hereafter be totally disabled by wounds received or sickness contracted while in the line of their duty during the present rebellion; and to have the necessary buildings erected, having due regard to the health of the location, facility of access, and competency to accommodate the persons provided for in this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That for the establishment and support of this asylum there shall be appropriated all stoppages or fines adjudged against volunteer officers, soldiers, or seamen by sentence of courts-martial or military commission, over and above the amounts necessary for the reimbursement of the Government or of individuals, all forfeitures on account of desertion from the volunteer service, and all moneys due deceased volunteer officers, soldiers, or seamen, which now are, or may be, unclaimed for three years after the death of such officers, soldiers, or seamen, to be repaid upon the demand of the heirs or legal representatives of such deceased officers, soldiers, or seamen. And the said directors are hereby authorized to receive all donations of money or property, made by any person or persons, for the benefit of the asylum, and to hold or dispose of the same for its sole and exclusive use.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the selection of the site for the said asylum, and the plan of the buildings, and the rules and regulations for the general and internal direction of the asylum, shall be made by the directors, and they may do all other acts necessary for the government and interests of the same as hereby authorized: Provided, however, That no selection of a site for said asylum or adoption of any plan of buildings shall be agreed upon until after the sum of half a million of dollars shall have been first subscribed or donated and paid into the treasury of said corporation.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the officers of the asylum shall consist of a governor, a deputy governor, a secretary and a treasurer, and such officers shall be appointed from the pensioned officers of the volunteer service, and they may be appointed and removed from time to time, as the interests of the institution may require, by the board of directors.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the following persons only shall be entitled to the benefits of the asylum, and may be admitted thereto upon the recommendation of the board of directors, namely: all volunteer officers, soldiers, and seamen who have served during the present war, who have been or who may be totally disabled by wounds received or sickness contracted in the line of their duty, and such persons on becoming inmates of this asylum shall assign thereto their pensions during the time they shall remain therein and receive its benefits.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the directors shall make an annual report of the condition of the asylum to the War Department, which shall be communicated to Congress on the first Monday of every January after the passage of this act, and it shall be the duty of the said directors to examine and audit the accounts of the treasurer of this asylum quarterly, and to visit and inspect them at least six times a year.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all inmates of the asylum shall be, and they are hereby, made subject to the rules and articles of war, and will be governed thereby in the same manner as if they were in the Army or Navy of the United States.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time hereafter alter, amend, or repeal this act.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCII.—An Act to incorporate the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Peter Cooper, William C. Bryant, A. A. Low, S. B. Chittenden, Charles H. Marshall, William A. Booth, Gerritt Smith, William A. Hall, William Allen, John Jay, Abraham Baldwin, A. S. Barnes, Hiram Barney, Seth B. Hunt, Samuel Holmes, Charles Collins, R. R. Graves, Walter S. Griffith, A. H. Wallis, D. S. Gregory, J. W. Alvord, George Whipple, A. S. Hatch, Walter T. Hatch, E. A. Lambert, W. G. Lambert, Roe Lockwood, R. H. Manning, R. W. Ropes, Albert Woodruff, and Thos. Dewey, of New York; John M. Forbes, Wm. Claflin, S. G. Howe, George L. Stearns, Edward Atkinson, A. A. Lawrence, and John M. S. Williams, of Massachusetts; Edward Harris and Thomas Davis, of Rhode Island; Stephen Colwell, J. Wheaton Smith, Francis E. Cope, Thomas Webster, B. S. Hunt, and Henry Samuel, of Pennsylvania; Edward Harwood, Adam Poe, Levi Coffin, J. M. Waldon, of Ohio, and their successors, are constituted a body-corporate, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, by the name of "The Freedman's Savings and Trust Company," and by that name may sue and be sued in any court of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the persons named in the first section of this act shall be the first trustees of the corporation, and all vacancies by death, resignation, or otherwise, in the office of trustee, shall be filled by the board by ballot, without unnecessary delay, and at least ten votes shall be necessary for the election of any trustee. The trustees shall hold a regular meeting at least once in each month, to receive reports of their officers on the affairs of the corporation, and to transact such business as may be necessary; and any trustee omitting to attend the regular meetings of the board for six months in succession, may thereupon be considered as having vacated his place, and a successor may be elected to fill the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the business of the corporation shall be managed and directed by the board of trustees, who shall elect from their number a president and two vice presidents; and may appoint such other officers as they may see fit; nine of the trustees, of whom the president or one of the vice presidents shall be one, shall form a quorum for the transaction of business at any regular or adjourned meeting of the board of trustees; and the affirmative vote of at least seven members of the board shall be requisite in making any order for, or authorizing the investment of any moneys, or the sale or transfer of any stock or securities belonging to the corporation, or the appointment of any officer receiving any salary therefrom.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the board of trustees of the corporation shall have power, from time to time, to make and establish such by-laws and regulations as they shall judge proper with regard to the elections of officers and their respective functions, and generally for the management of the affairs of the corporation, provided such by-laws and regulations are not repugnant to this act or to the Constitution or laws of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the general business and object of the corporation hereby created shall be to receive on deposit such sums of money as may be from time to time offered therefor, by, or on behalf of, persons heretofore held in slavery in the United States, or their descendants, and investing the same in the stocks, bonds, Treasury notes, or other securities of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the trustees of the corporation to invest, as soon as practicable, in the securities named in the next preceding section, all sums received by them beyond an available fund, not exceeding one third of the total amount of deposits with the corporation, at the discretion of the trustees, which available funds may be kept by the trustees to meet current payments of the corporation, and may by them be left on deposit at interest or otherwise, or in such available form as the trustees may direct.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the corporation may, under such regulations as the board of trustees shall from time to time prescribe, receive any deposit hereby authorized to be received, upon such trusts and for such purposes, not contrary to the laws of the United States, as may be indicated in writing by the depositor, such writing to be subscribed by the depositor and acknowledged or proved before any officer in the civil or military service of the United States, the certificate of which acknowledgment or proof shall be indorsed on the writing; and the writing so acknowledged or proved shall accompany such deposit and be filed among the papers of the corporation, and be carefully preserved therein, and may be read in evidence in any court or before any judicial officer of the United States, without further proof; and the certificate of acknowledgment or proof shall be prima facie evidence only of the due execution of such writing.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all sums received on deposit shall be repaid to such depositor when required, at such time, with such interest, not exceeding seven per centum per annum, and under such regulations as the board of trustees shall, from time to time, prescribe, which regulations shall be posted up in some conspicuous place in the room where the business of the corporation shall be transacted, but shall not be altered so as to affect any deposit previously made.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all trusts upon which, and all purposes for which any deposit shall be made, and which shall be indicated in the writing to accompany such deposit, shall be faithfully performed by the corporation, unless the performing of the same is rendered impossible.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That when any depositor shall die, the funds remaining on deposit with the corporation to his credit, and all accumulations thereof, shall belong and be paid to the personal representatives of such depositor, in case he shall have left a last will and testament; and in default of a last will and testament, or of any person qualifying under a last will and testament competent to act as executor, the corporation shall be entitled, in respect to the funds so remaining on deposit to the credit of any such depositor, to administration thereon in preference to all other persons, and letters of administration shall be granted to the corporation accordingly in the manner prescribed by law in respect to the granting of letters of administration, with the will annexed, and in cases of intestacy.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That in the case of the death of any depositor, whose deposit shall not be held upon any trust created pursuant to the provisions hereinbefore contained, or where it may prove impossible to execute such trust, it shall be the duty of the corporation to make diligent efforts to ascertain and discover whether such deceased depositor has left a husband, wife, or children surviving, and the corporation shall keep a record of the efforts so made, and of the results thereof, and in case no person lawfully entitled thereto shall be discovered, or shall appear, or claim the funds remaining to the credit of such depositor before the expiration of two years from the death of such depositor, it shall be lawful for the corporation to hold and invest such funds as a separate trust fund, to be applied, with the accumulations thereof, to the education and improvement of persons heretofore held in slavery, or their descendants, being inhabitants of the United States, in such manner and through such agencies as the board of trustees shall deem best calculated to effect that object: Provided, That if any depositor be not heard from within five years from the date of his last deposit, the trustees shall advertise the same in some paper of general circulation in the State where the principal office of the company is established, and also in the State where the principal office of the company is established, and also in the State where the depositor was last heard from; and if within two years thereafter such depositor shall not appear, nor a husband, wife, or child of such depositor, to claim his deposits, they shall be used by the board of trustees as hereinbefore provided for in this section.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no president, vice president, trustee, officer, or servant of the corporation shall, directly or indirectly, borrow the funds of the corporation or its deposits, or in any manner use the same, or any part thereof, except to pay necessary expenses, under the direction of the board of trustees. All certificates [or] other evidences of deposit made by the proper officers shall be as binding on the corporation as if they were made under their common seal. It shall be the duty of the trustees to regulate the rate of interest allowed to the depositors, so that they shall receive as nearly as may be a ratable proportion of all the profits of such corporation after deducting all necessary expenses: Provided, however, That the trustees may allow to depositors, to the amount of five hundred dollars or upward, one per centum less than the amount allowed others: And provided also, Whenever it shall appear that, after the payment of the usual interest to depositors, there is in the possession of the corporation an excess of profits over the liabilities amounting to ten per centum upon the deposits, such excess shall be invested for the security of the depositors in the corporation; and thereafter, at each annual examination of the affairs of the corporation, any surplus over and above such ten per centum shall, in addition to the usual interest, be divided rateably among the depositors, in such manner as the board of trustees shall direct.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That whenever any deposit shall be made by any minor, the trustees of the corporation may, at their discretion, pay to such depositor such sums as may be due to him, although no guardian shall have been appointed for such minor, or the guardian of such minor shall not have authorized the drawing of the same; and the check, receipt, or acquittance of such minor shall be as valid as if the same were executed by a guardian of such minor, or the minor were of full age, if such deposit was made personally by such minor. And whenever any deposits shall have been made by married women, the trustees may repay the same on their own receipts.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the trustees shall not, directly or indirectly, receive any payment or emolument for their services as such, except the president and vice president.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the president and vice president, the subordinate officers and agents of the corporation shall respectively give such security for their fidelity and good conduct as the board of trustees may from time to time require, and the board shall fix the salaries of such officers and agents.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the books of the corporation shall, at all times during the hours of business, be open for inspection and examination to such persons as Congress shall designate or appoint.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCIII.—An Act for the better Organization of the Subsistence Department.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, during the continuance of the present rebellion, the Secretary of War may, when in his judgment it is necessary, assign to each geographical military division, to each separate army in the field consisting of more than one Army corps, to each military department, and to each principal subsistence depot, not exceeding ten in number, an officer of the subsistence department, to act as chief commissary of such military division, army, military department, or depot, and also an officer of the subsistence department as assistant in the office of the Commissary General of Subsistence, each of whom, while so assigned and acting, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of the subsistence department; and, in like manner, may assign, for purposes of inspection or other special duty in the subsistence department, commissaries of subsistence, not exceeding six in number, each of whom, while so assigned and acting, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of the subsistence department; and to each Army corps an officer of the subsistence department to be chief commissary of the corps, with the like rank of lieutenant colonel; and, in like manner, may assign to each division of two or more brigades a commissary, who, while so assigned and acting, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major of the subsistence department: Provided, That when any one of said officers is relieved from such duty, his increased rank, pay, and emoluments, allowed because of such assignment, shall cease, and he shall return to his commissioned rank in the subsistence department: And provided further, That the officers authorized to be assigned by this act shall be selected for each grade from the commissaries of subsistence who hold commissions or rank in the volunteer service and in the regular subsistence department in proportion to the number of each of said classes respectively in service at the date of the passage of this act.

Laws of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCIV.—An Act to provide for two Assistant Local Inspectors of Steamboats in the City of New York, and for two Local Inspectors at Galena, Illinois, and to reestablish the Board of Local Inspectors at Wheeling; and also to amend the Act approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, entitled "An Act to create an additional Inspector of Steamboats and two Local Inspectors of Steamboats for Collection Districts of Memphis and Oregon, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be designated and appointed, in the mode prescribed by law, two assistant local inspectors of steamboats in the city of New York, and two local inspectors at the city of Galena, Illinois, with an annual compensation of twelve hundred dollars for the said assistant local inspectors in the city of New York, and eight hundred dollars for the two local inspectors at the city of Galena, Illinois, as in case of other like inspectors; and said inspectors shall perform the duties and be subject to the provisions of the steamboat act of August thirtieth, eighteen hundred and fifty-two. And the local board of inspectors at Wheeling is hereby reestablished.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of the fees for inspection prescribed by the sixth section of the act entitled "An act to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes," approved June eighth, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, there shall be levied and paid for each steam-vessel of one hundred tons or under, twenty-five dollars, and in addition thereto for each and every ton, in excess of one hundred tons, five cents.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCV.—An Act to provide for the Publication of the Opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract on behalf of the United States with a suitable book publisher for the printing and publishing of the unpublished opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States, delivered since the fourth of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, on the terms following, to wit: The said opinions to be published in as many volumes as may be necessary, which shall be, as to the quality of paper, printing, and binding, of uniform style and appearance with the eighth volume of said opinions, published by Robert Farnham, in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, and, as nearly as possible, of uniform size with said eighth volume, and which shall be numbered in regular order after the said eighth volume; the copyright thereof to be taken out by, and be for the use of, the publisher, who shall deliver to the Attorney General for the use of the United States, within one month after the publication thereof, three hundred sets of said volumes, at the price of three dollars per volume, payable after they are so delivered. And the Attorney General is hereby authorized to employ a competent person to edit and prepare the said opinions for publication, as aforesaid, with proper head notes, and a full and complete index, and to supervise the said publication. When the said three hundred sets shall have been delivered for the use of the United States, the Attorney General shall cause them to be distributed as follows: For the President of the United States, two sets; for the Department of State, ten sets; for the Department of the Treasury and the heads of the bureaus thereof, twenty-five sets; for the Department of War and the heads of the bureaus thereof, twenty-five sets; for the Department of the Navy and the heads of bureaus thereof, fifteen sets; for the Department of the Interior and the heads of bureaus thereof, twenty sets; for the Department of the Post Office, ten sets; for the Attorney General's office, ten sets; for the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, one set each; for the library of said court, three sets; for the judges of the Court of Claims, the solicitor and assistant and deputy solicitors of said court, one set each; for the Library of Congress, fifty sets, for the use of both Houses of Congress; the residue of the said three hundred sets to remain in charge of the Librarian of Congress, at the future disposal of Congress. And the sum of seven thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for the editing of the said opinions and the price of the said three hundred volumes, which money shall be disbursed on vouchers approved by the Attorney General.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCVI.—An Act to remove all Disqualification of Color in carrying the Mails.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act no person, by reason of color, shall be disqualified from employment in carrying the mails, and all acts and parts of acts establishing such disqualification, including especially the seventh section of the act of March third, eighteen hundred and twenty-five, are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCVII.—An Act relating to the Clerks in the Post Office Department.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the third section of an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-four," approved the third of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize the appointment of a chief clerk in the offices of each of the three Assistant Postmaster General, at a salary of two thousand dollars per annum each.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of temporary clerks now employed in the Post Office Department and paid out of the appropriation for postage stamps and stamped envelopes and the proceeds of sales of waste paper, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint two clerks of class three, two clerks of class two, and five clerks of class one.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of eighteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the clerks provided for in the two preceding sections of this act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of six thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of such temporary clerks as the Postmaster General may, from time to time, deem necessary.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That unclaimed money in dead letters for which no owner can be found, and also all money derived from sales of waste paper or other public property in post offices or the Post Office Department, be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, under the direction of the Postmaster General, for the service of the Post Office Department; and any postmaster or clerk in a post office, or any other clerk, officer, or agent of the Post Office Department, having temporary custody of such money, and willfully neglecting to deposit the same as herein provided, shall be deemed to be guilty of felony, and be subject to a fine not exceeding double the sum so retained by such clerk or other agents as aforesaid, or imprisonment not exceeding three years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCVIII.—An Act amendatory of the Acts relative to the Attorney General's Office, and to fix the Compensation of his Assistant and Clerks.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter the salary of the Assistant Attorney General shall be, and the same is hereby, raised to the sum of thirty-five hundred dollars per annum.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the provisions of law prescribing the Attorney General's powers as to the employment of clerks in his office, it is provided that the Attorney General shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ in his office one chief clerk at a salary of two thousand and two hundred dollars per annum, two fourth-class clerks (being one "pardon clerk" and one "opinion clerk") at annual salaries of eighteen hundred dollars each, two third-class clerks at annual salaries of sixteen hundred dollars each, and one first-class clerk at an annual salary of twelve hundred dollars, beside such temporary clerks as may from time to time be needed: Provided, however, That the allowances to such temporary clerks shall in no one year exceed one thousand dollars.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of paying, for the current fiscal year, the increased compensation above provided, the Attorney General is hereby authorized, in addition to the amounts already appropriated for the payment of salaries in his office in the appropriation bill for the current fiscal year, to draw on and use from the unexpended balance of moneys standing on the books of the Treasury, on the first of July last, to the credit of his office for the pay of clerks and messenger, or from any other appropriation then standing to the credit of his office, and yet subject to his control and unexpended, a sum not exceeding, in the whole, twenty-four hundred dollars, toward such additional compensation for the current fiscal year.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. XCIX.—An Act to provide for the Construction of certain Wagon Roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska.

First. A road from Niobrara to the mouth of the Turtle Hill river, and thence, upon the most direct practicable route, to Virginia City, in Montana Territory, with a branch from the mouth of Turtle Hill river, or such other point as may be selected, to Omaha.

Second. A road from a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sioux river, via Yankton, Dakota Territory, to a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sheyenne river, thence up said river to its main forks, thence up the north fork to a point of intersection with the road from Niobrara.

Third. For a road from a point on the western boundary of Minnesota, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, to a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sheyenne river.

Fourth. A road from Virginia City, in Montana, upon the most practicable route, to Lewiston, in Idaho.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the provisions of the foregoing section, the sum of one hundred and forty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, fifty thousand dollars of which shall be applied to the construction of the road from Virginia City to Lewiston; fifty thousand dollars shall be applied to the construction of the road from Niobrara and branch to Omaha; twenty thousand dollars shall be applied to the construction of the road from the mouth of the Big Sheyenne to its intersection with the Niobrara road; ten thousand dollars shall be applied to the construction of a bridge over the Big Sioux river, or so much of this sum as may be necessary, and any balance remaining to be applied to continuing and improving the road from Sioux City, Iowa, to the Big Sheyenne, Dakota Territory, and the remainder shall be applied to the construction of the road from the western boundary of Minnesota to the Big Sheyenne river: Provided, That any unexpended money now in the Treasury, appropriated for the construction of a road from Sioux City to Fort Randall, Dakota Territory, shall be, and is hereby, transferred from the War Department to the Department of the Interior.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. C.—An Act to authorize the Coinage of Three-Cent Pieces, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so soon as practicable after the passage of this act, there shall be coined at the Mint of the United States a three-cent piece, composed of copper and nickel in such proportions, not exceeding twenty-five per centum of nickel, as shall be determined by the Director of the Mint, the standard weight of which shall be thirty grains, with no greater deviation than four grains to each piece, and the shape, mottoes, and devices of said coin shall be determined by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. And the laws now in force relating to the coinage of cents, and providing for the purchase of material and prescribing the appropriate duties of the officers of the Mint, and of the Secretary of the Treasury be, and the same are hereby, extended to the coinage herein provided for.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all laws now in force, relating to the coins of the United States, and the striking and coinage of the same, shall so far as applicable be extended to the coinage herein authorized, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, for the security of the coin, regulating and guarding the process of striking and coining, for preventing debasement, or counterfeiting, or for any other purpose. And the Director of the Mint shall prescribe suitable regulations to insure a due conformity to the required weights and proportions of alloy in the said coin, and shall order trials thereof to be made from time to time, by the assayer of the Mint, whereof a report shall be made in writing to the Director.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said coin shall be a legal tender in any payment to the amount of sixty cents. And it shall be lawful to pay out said coins in exchange for the lawful currency of the United States, (except cents or half cents or two-cent pieces issued under former acts of Congress,) in suitable sums by the treasurer of the Mint, and by such other depositaries as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and under general regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. And under the like regulations the same may be exchanged in suitable sums for any lawful currency of the United States; and the expenses incident to such exchange, distribution, and transmission, may be paid out of the profits of said coinage, and the net profits of said coinage, ascertained in like manner as is prescribed in the second section of the act entitled "An act relating to foreign coins, and the coinage of cents at the Mint of the United States," approved February twenty-first, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, shall be transferred to the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act, no issues of fractional notes of the United States shall be of a less denomination than five cents, and all such issues of a less denomination, at that time outstanding, shall, when paid into the Treasury or any designated depositary of the United States, or redeemed or exchanged as now provided by law, be retained and canceled.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall knowingly make, issue, or pass, or cause to be made, issued, or past [passed], any coin, card, token, or device, whatsoever, in metal or its compounds, intended to pass or be passed as money, for the coin authorized by this act, or for coin of equal value, such person or persons shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the devices and legends upon the gold, silver, and other coins of the United States, it shall be lawful for the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cause the motto "In God we trust" to be placed upon such coins hereafter to be issued as shall admit of such legend thereon.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the one and two cent coins of the United States shall not be a legal tender for any payment exceeding four cents in amount; and so much of the laws of the United States heretofore enacted as are in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CI.—An Act to regulate the Fees of Custom-House Officers on the Northern, Northeastern, and Northwestern Frontiers of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in lieu of the fees now authorized by law to be collected by customs officers on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, there shall be levied and collected:

For admeasurements of vessels, the fees prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States," approved May six, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Certificate of registry, including bond, two dollars and twenty-five cents.

Indorsement on register, one dollar.

Receiving certified manifest and granting permit to unlade on entry of a vessel from any other district, on vessel of fifty tons or under, twenty-five cents; on vessel of over fifty tons, one dollar.

Entry of a vessel from a foreign port otherwise than by sea, if vessel of fifty tons or under, fifty cents; if of over fifty tons, one dollar; and the same fees for clearance of like vessels to foreign ports.

Receiving manifest of goods brought into the United States from foreign countries adjoining said frontiers by land vehicles, and permit to unlade the same, twenty-five cents.

Receiving manifest of baggage of passengers arriving from foreign countries, adjoining said frontiers, including permit to unlade the same, twenty-five cents.

Granting permit to a vessel not belonging [to] a citizen of the United States to go from district to district, two dollars, and [the] same fee for receiving manifest and granting permit to unlade such vessel on arrival in a district from another district.

Entry of goods imported from any foreign port or place for consumption, warehousing, rewarehousing, transportation, or exportation, entry, including official certificate or oath on entry or to invoice, fifty cents, and for every post entry, forty cents.

Permit to land or deliver goods not above provided for, twenty-five cents.

Official bonds not herein provided for, each one dollar.

Debenture on [or] other official certificate not herein provided for, twenty-five cents.

Bill of health, twenty-five cents.

Crew-list, including bond, one dollar.

Protection, fifty cents.

Recording bill of sales, mortgages, hypothecations, or conveyances, fifty cents each, and certified copies thereof, fifty cents each.

Recording certificates for discharging and canceling such conveyances, fifty cents; copies thereof, twenty-five cents.

Certificate setting forth the names of the owners of a vessel, with their respective interest, and also the material facts of any existing bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or other incumbrance, the date and amount of such incumbrance, and the parties thereto, one dollar: Provided, That no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, conveyance, or discharge of mortgage or other incumbrance of any vessel, shall be recorded unless the same is duly acknowledged before a notary public or other officer authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CII.—An Act granting Land to the State of Michigan, to aid in building a Harbor and Ship-Canal at Portage Lake, Kewenaw Point, Lake Superior.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, There be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Michigan the right of locating and constructing a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal through any public lands at or upon the neck of land on Lake Superior known as "The Portage:" Provided, That not more than one thousand feet in width on the bank of Lake Superior shall be occupied by said breakwater and harbor, and that a strip of land not more than four hundred feet in width on said neck of land shall be occupied by said canal: And provided further, That said ship-canal shall be at least one hundred feet in width, with a depth of water not less than thirteen feet.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the said State of Michigan, for the purpose of aiding said State in constructing and completing a harbor and ship-canal to connect the waters of Lake Superior with the waters of Portage Lake, two hundred thousand acres of public lands, to be selected in subdivisions agreeably to the United States survey, by an agent or agents appointed by the Governor of said State, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from any lands in the upper peninsula of said State, subject to private entry: Provided, That said selections shall be made from alternate and odd-numbered sections of land nearest the location of said canal in said upper peninsula, not otherwise appropriated, and not from lands designated by the United States as "mineral" before the passage of this act, nor from lands to which the rights of preëmption or homestead have attached.

Laws of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said lands hereby granted shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of said State, or, if the Legislature thereof shall not be in session, or shall adjourn within ten days after the passage and approval of this act, then said lands shall be subject to the disposal of the Governor and board of control of said State, for the purpose aforesaid and for no other; and the said canal shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or charge upon the vessels of said Government, or upon vessels employed by said Government in the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That before it shall be competent for said State to dispose of any of said lands, to be selected as aforesaid, the plan of said breakwater and harbor, and the route of said canal shall be established as aforesaid, and a plat or plats thereof shall be filed in the office of the War Department, and a duplicate thereof in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if the said breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal shall not be completed within two years from the passage of this act, the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Legislature of said State shall cause to be kept an accurate account of the sales and net proceeds of the lands hereby granted, and of all expenditures in the construction, repairs, and operating of said canal, and of the earnings thereof, and shall return a statement of the same annually to the Secretary of the Interior; and whenever said State shall be fully reimbursed for all advances made for the construction, repairs, and operating of said canal, with legal interest on all advances, until the reimbursement of the same, or upon payment by the United States of any balance of such advances over such receipts from said lands and canal, with such interest, the said State shall be allowed to tax for the use of said canal only such tolls as shall be sufficient to pay all necessary expenses for the care, charge, and repair of the same.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CIII.—An Act to extend the Time for the completion of certain Railroads to which Land Grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Michigan, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Marquette, on Lake Superior, to the Wisconsin State line, at or near the mouth of the Menomonee river, for the benefit and use of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company, a corporation of the States of Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and from Marquette to Ontonagon, for the use and benefit of the Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Michigan, and for twenty miles westerly from Marquette of the Bay de Noquet and Marquette railroad, for the benefit and use of the Bay de Noquet and Marquette Railroad Company, four additional alternate sections of land, per mile, to that already granted by act of Congress approved June third, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-six, and joint resolution supplementary thereto, to be selected upon the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations as are contained in the act of Congress entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Michigan, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June third, eighteen hundred and fifty-six: Provided, That the land to be so located by either of said roads shall be selected from the alternate sections, designated by odd numbers, within twenty miles of the line of said road.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the lands granted by said act of Congress and by this act shall be disposed of only in the following manner, that is to say: When the Governor of the State of Michigan shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any ten consecutive miles upon the route of either of said roads is completed in a good and substantial manner, as a first-class railroad, then the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a certificate or certificates to issue to said State for one hundred sections of land, for the benefit and use of such company, and so from time to time for each completed section of ten miles of either of said roads, one hundred sections of land, until the whole shall be completed: Provided, That none of the additional lands granted by this act for that portion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad now completed shall be certified to the State of Michigan, by the terms hereof, until the said railroad shall be completed from a point twenty miles west of Marquette to Ontonagon; and that none of the additional lands granted by this act for that portion of the railroad from Marquette to the Wisconsin State line at or near the mouth of the Menomonee river, now completed, shall be so certified until the said railroad shall be completed from Bay de Noquet to the said Wisconsin State line at or near the mouth of the Menomonee river aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the time limited for the completion of the road from Marquette to the Wisconsin State line, at or near the mouth of the Menomonee river, be, and the same is hereby, extended for the term of five years, from and after the third day of June, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no lands to be set apart for the road from Marquette to Bay de Noquet, and from Marquette to Ontonagon, shall be selected and certified east of that portion of the range line dividing ranges twenty-six and twenty-seven, that is, south of the township line between townships forty-seven and forty-eight, nor south of that portion of the township line dividing townships forty-seven and forty-eight, that lies east of the dividing range line above named; and that no lands to be set apart for the road from Marquette, on Lake Superior, to the Wisconsin State line, at or near the mouth of the Menomonee river, shall be selected and certified west of that portion of the range line dividing ranges twenty-six and twenty-seven, that is, north of the township line dividing townships forty-two and forty-three, nor north of the township line dividing townships forty-seven and forty-eight; and that, for the purpose of making up any deficiency of lands to which the line of road from Marquette to Bay de Noquet may be entitled to make its grant equal to ten sections to the mile, the same shall be certified on the route from Marquette to Ontonagon, within twenty miles of the line of said road, and east of the range line dividing ranges thirty-one and thirty-two, and in accordance with the provisions hereinbefore contained. And that, whenever the Governor of the State of Michigan shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that twenty consecutive miles of the line of road from Marquette to Bay de Noquet has been completed in a good and substantial manner, as a first-class railroad, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be issued to said State of Michigan, for the use and benefit of the Bay de Noquet and Marquette Railroad Company, assignee of the State of Michigan, a certificate or certificates for two hundred sections of land, to be selected and located from the sections designated by odd numbers, on the line from Marquette to Ontonagon, and within twenty miles of said line.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the time for the completion of the railroad from Fond du Lac, on Lake Winnebago, to the Wisconsin State line, at or near the mouth of the Menomonee river, shall be, and hereby is, extended for the period of five years from and after the third day of June, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six; and that any and all grants of land to said road shall continue and remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each of said companies shall grade, in a good and substantial manner, ready for the ties, twenty miles of its road within two years, and twenty miles additional thereof in each year thereafter: Provided, That if said companies, or either of them, shall neglect or fail to do so, or to complete its road within the time herein specified, the land granted to such company shall revert to the United States.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CIV.—An Act to establish certain Post Roads.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following be established as post roads:

CHAP. CV.—An Act extending the Time for the Completion of certain Land-Grant Railroads in the States of Minnesota and Iowa, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the quantity of lands granted to the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, as indicated in the first section of an [act] entitled "An act making a grant of land to the Territory of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said Territory, and granting public lands, in alternate sections, to the State of Alabama, to aid in the construction of a certain railroad in said State," approved March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, shall be increased to ten sections per mile for each of said railroads and branches, subject to any and all limitations contained in said act and subsequent acts, and as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the first proviso in the first section of the act aforesaid shall be so amended as to read as follows, to wit: Provided, That the land to be so located shall in no case be further than twenty miles from the lines of said roads and branches, to aid in the construction of each of which said grant is made; and said lands granted shall, in all cases, be indicated by the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement or other purpose whatever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved and excepted from the operations of this act, except so far as may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States: Provided further, That any lands which may have been granted to the Territory or State of Minnesota for the purpose of aiding in the construction of any railroad, which lands may be located within the limits of this extension of said grant or grants, shall be deducted from the full quantity of lands hereby granted, and that any lands which may have been so granted shall be strictly applied in accordance with the terms and conditions of said act or acts, unless subsequently modified by law.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of land, which by said acts and this grant shall remain to the United States, within ten miles on each side of said roads and branches, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold, nor shall any of said lands become subject to sale at private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder at or above the minimum price as aforesaid: Provided, That actual bona fide settlers under the preemption laws of the United States may, after the proof of settlement, improvement, and occupation, as now provided by law, purchase the same at the increased minimum price: And provided also, That settlers under the provisions of the homestead law, who comply with the terms and requirements of said act, shall be entitled to patents for an amount not exceeding eighty acres each, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Laws of the United States.

38TH CONG...2D SESS.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, for the purposes aforesaid, and no other. And the said railroads and branches shall be and remain public highways for the use of the Government of the United States, free of all toll or other charges upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby and heretofore granted to said Territory or State of Minnesota shall be disposed of by said State for the purposes aforesaid only, and in manner following, namely: When the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any section of ten consecutive miles of said road is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, and the said Secretary shall be satisfied that said State has complied in good faith with this requirement, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents for all the lands granted and selected as aforesaid, not exceeding ten sections per mile, situated opposite to and within a limit of twenty miles of the line of said section of road thus completed, extending along the whole length of said completed section of ten miles of road, and no further. And when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary shall be satisfied that another section of said road, ten consecutive miles in extent, connecting with the preceding section or with some other first-class railroad, which may be at the time in successful operation, is completed as aforesaid, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents for all the lands granted and situated opposite to and within the limit of twenty miles of the line of said completed section of road or roads, and extending the length of said section, and no further, not exceeding ten sections of land per mile for all that part of said road thus completed under the provisions of this act and the act to which this is an amendment, and so, from time to time, until said roads and branches are completed. And when the Governor of said State shall so certify, and the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that the whole of any one of said roads and branches is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents to all the remaining lands granted for and on account of said completed road and branches in this act, situated within the said limits of twenty miles from the line thereof, throughout the entire length of said road and branches: Provided, That no land shall be granted or conveyed to said State under the provisions of this act on account of the construction of any railroad or part thereof that has been constructed under the provisions of any other act at the date of the passage of this act, and adopted as a part of the line of railroad provided for in this act: And provided, That nothing herein contained shall interfere with any existing rights acquired under any law of Congress heretofore enacted making grants of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of railroads: And provided further, That said lands, granted by this or prior acts, shall not in any manner be disposed of, except as the same are patented under the provisions of this act; and should the State fail to complete any one of said roads or branches within eight years after the passage of this act, then the said lands undisposed of as aforesaid, granted on account of said road or branches, shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the Governor of the said State of Minnesota shall file or cause to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior maps designating the routes of said road and branches, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from market the lands embraced within the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail be transported on said road, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such price as Congress may by law provide: Provided, That until such price is fixed by law, the Postmaster General shall have power to fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall also be construed so as to apply and extend to that portion of the line authorized to be vacated by the joint resolution approved July twelfth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, entitled "A joint resolution authorizing the State of Minnesota to change the line of certain branch railroads in said State, and for other purposes," notwithstanding the vacation thereof by said State, as though said joint resolution had not passed, and also to the line adopted by said State, in lieu of the portion of the line so vacated.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the time mentioned in an act entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," for the completion of the railroads named in said act, be, and the same is hereby, extended two years.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the last clause of the second section of an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of registers and receivers of the land offices in the several States and Territories, in the location of lands by States and corporations under general grants from Congress, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to read: "A map of the change shall be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office within three months after the said change of location shall be made."

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CVI.—An Act to regulate the Taking of Depositions in certain Cases.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any defendant in a criminal case, in the District of Columbia, either after preliminary examination, indictment, or information, may examine witnesses on commission in such manner as is hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a defendant wishing to take the deposition of a witness residing more than one hundred miles from the city of Washington may select any of the following officers as a commissioner [er] to take such deposition: the clerk or judge of any court of record, or any notary public, or any consul of the United States, either by the name of office of such officer, or by his individual name and official style; and the name of the court of which such constituted commissioner is clerk or judge, and the name of the State and county, or if without the United States the name of the State and town, or city, in which such notary or consul resides must be stated in the notice and in the commission.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That five days' notice must be given by a defendant, or his or her attorney, of the time when a commission will be sued out of the office of the clerk of the criminal court for the District of Columbia for taking the deposition of the witness, (giving the name of the witness,) which notice must be accompanied with a copy of the interrogatories to be asked such witness.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That at or before the time fixed in the notice, the district attorney may file cross-interrogatories; but if he fail so to do, the clerk shall file the following:

1. Are all of your statements in the foregoing answers made from your personal knowledge; and if not, do your answers show what are made from your personal knowledge, and what from information, and the source of that information? If not, now show what is from information, and give its source.

2. State everything you know concerning this case favorable to either the Government or the defendant.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the notice and copy of interrogatories may be served and returned in the same manner and by the same officers or persons as is provided by law for the service and return of a summons or subpoena in civil actions within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the commission shall issue in the name of the criminal court, and under its seal, and must be signed by the clerk, and need contain nothing but the authority conferred upon the commissioner and instructions to guide him, a statement of the cause in which the testimony is to be used, and a copy of all the interrogatories filed appended.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the person before whom any of the depositions above contemplated are taken must cause the interrogatories appended to the commission to be written out, and the answers thereto to be inserted immediately underneath the respective questions; the whole, when completed, being read over by or to the witness, must be by him or her subscribed and sworn to in the usual manner.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all exhibits produced before the person taking the deposition, or proved or referred to by any witness, or correct copies thereof, must be appended to the depositions, and returned with them, unless sufficient reasons be shown for not so doing.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the person taking the deposition shall attach his certificate thereto, stating that it was subscribed and sworn to by the deponent at the time and place therein mentioned; the whole, including the commission and interrogatories, must then be sealed up and returned to the clerk of the criminal court of the District of Columbia, by mail, unless the defendant and the district attorney agree upon some other mode; and, when received by said clerk, he shall open the package and place the deposition on file in his office.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That unimportant deviations from any of the above directions shall not cause the deposition to be excluded where no substantial prejudice could be wrought to the Government by such deviation.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That, subject to the regulations hereinafter contained, the court may establish further rules for taking depositions and all other acts connected therewith.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CVII.—An Act supplemental to the Act approved first July, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, "for the Disposal of Coal Lands and of Town Property in the Public Domain."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the case of any citizen of the United States who, at the passage of this act, may be in the business of bona fide actual coal-mining on the public lands, except on lands reserved by the President of the United States for public uses, for purposes of commerce, such citizen, upon making proof satisfactory to the register and receiver to that effect, shall have the right to enter, according to legal subdivisions, a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, to embrace his improvements and mining premises, at the minimum price of twenty dollars per acre, fixed in the coal and town property act of first July, eighteen hundred and sixty-four: Provided, That where the mining improvements and premises are on land surveyed at the passage of this act, a sworn declaratory statement descriptive of the tract and premises, showing also the extent and character of the improvements, shall be filed within six months from the date of this act; and proof and payment shall be made within one year from the date of such filing; but where such mining premises may be on lands hereafter to be surveyed, such declaratory statement shall be filed within three months from the return to the district land office of the official township plat; and proof and payment shall be made within one year from the date of such filing.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in the case of any city or town which, at the passage of this act, may be existing on the public lands, in which the lots therein may be variant as to size from the limitation fixed in the said act of first July, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and in which the lots and buildings as municipal improvements shall cover an area greater than six hundred and forty acres, such variance as to size of lots or excess in area shall prove no bar to such city or town claim, under said act of first July, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, effect to be given to this act according to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior:

Laws of the United States.

Provided, That the minimum price of each said lots in any such town or city, which may contain a greater number of square feet than the maximum named in the act to which this is an amendment, shall be increased to such reasonable amount as the Secretary of the Interior may by rule establish: Provided further, That where mineral veins are possessed, which possession is recognized by local authority, and to the extent so possessed and recognized, the title to town lots to be acquired shall be subject to such recognized possession and the necessary use thereof: Provided, however, That nothing contained herein shall be so construed as to recognize any color of title in possessors for mining purposes as against the Government of the United States.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CVIII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled “An Act to amend an Act entitled ‘An Act making a Grant of alternate Sections of Public Lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the Construction of certain Railroads in said State, and for other purposes.’”

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section one of an act entitled “An act to amend an act entitled ‘An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes,’” which said amendatory act was approved June seventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to make the last proviso in said section to read as follows, to wit: Provided further, That the time specified in the fourth section of the act hereby amended, for the completion of said road, shall be, and the same is hereby, extended eight years.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CIX.—An Act to authorize the Issuing of Patents for certain Lands in the Town of Stockbridge, State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, upon satisfactory proof being made that any occupant[s] of unpatented land in the town of Stockbridge, Calumet county, in the State of Wisconsin, which has, by treaty or otherwise, been allotted to any individual members of the Stockbridge or Munsee tribe of Indians, are the purchasers, grantees, or assignees of such members of said tribes, the President of the United States be authorized to issue patents for the land so occupied to such purchasers, grantees, or assignees, respectively: Provided, That in case of conflicting claims to any of the lots of land the Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized to hear the proofs of the respective claimants, and to decide which of such claimants are justly entitled to said land, and patents shall be issued in accordance with such decision.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That patents issued according to this act shall vest in the patentee title to the land described in such patent, in fee simple, subject to any valid lien or incumbrance thereon created by said patentee or those under whom he claims.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lots of land in said town of Stockbridge belonging to the United States, not hereinbefore directed to be patented, shall be attached to and form a part of the Menasha land district, and if, in the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it shall be for the public interest, the same may be sold at the minimum price of three dollars per acre for lots fronting on Lake Winnebago, five dollars per acre for the two tiers of lots fronting on the military road, one tier of lots on each side thereof, and two dollars and fifty cents per acre for the residue of said land to actual settlers thereon possessing the qualifications requisite to acquire preemption rights, who shall prove to the satisfaction of the register of the land office at Menasha, Wisconsin, that he or she has made improvements to the value of not less than fifty dollars, and is actually residing upon the land; the time of paying the purchase price may be extended for a period not exceeding one year from the passage of this act: Provided, That no such actual settler shall be permitted to preempt more than two contiguous lots on which he or she has made improvements of the value of not less than one hundred dollars. The lands not sold within one year as hereinbefore provided, shall be brought into market and sold at not less than the minimum prices fixed by this act.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CX.—An Act to quiet Titles in Favor of Parties in actual Possession of Lands situated in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all deeds heretofore recorded in the land records of the District of Columbia, which have been executed and acknowledged by femmes covert (their husbands having signed and sealed the same) for conveying any real estate, or interest therein, situated in said District; and all acknowledgments of deeds heretofore recorded, as aforesaid, which have been made by femmes covert (whether they have executed the deed or not) for the purpose of releasing their claims to dower in the lands described therein, situated as aforesaid, in which acknowledgments the form prescribed by law has not been followed; and all deeds heretofore recorded, as aforesaid, which have been executed and acknowledged by an attorney-in-fact, duly appointed for conveying real estate situated in said District; and all deeds heretofore recorded, as aforesaid, executed and acknowledged, or only acknowledged by such attorney-in-fact, for conveying real estate situated in said District, as to which the acknowledgment was made before officers different from those before whom proof of the power of attorney was made, and as to which the power of attorney was proved before only one justice of the peace; and all deeds heretofore executed and recorded as aforesaid for the purpose of conveying land situated in said District, acknowledged out of the District of Columbia, before a judge of a United States court, or before two aldermen of a city, or the chief magistrate of a city, or before a notary public; and all deeds heretofore executed and recorded as aforesaid for the purpose of conveying land situated in said District, acknowledged by an attorney-in-fact, duly appointed, or by an officer of a corporation, duly authorized, who has acknowledged the same to be his act and deed, instead of the act and deed of the grantor or of the corporation; and all deeds heretofore executed and recorded as aforesaid for the purpose of conveying land situated in said District to which there is not annexed a legal certificate as to the official character of the officer or officers taking the acknowledgment, shall be, and the same are hereby, declared to be of the same effect and validity to pass the fee simple or other estate intended to be conveyed, and bar dower in the real estate therein mentioned in favor of parties in actual possession, claiming under and through such deeds, as if such deeds had been by such femmes covert executed and acknowledged, or acknowledged in case of a dower right, in the form heretofore prescribed by law; as if such deeds had been executed and acknowledged by the grantor in the deed; as if such power of attorney had been proved before the officer or officers taking the acknowledgment; as if such power of attorney had been proved before two justices of the peace; as if such acknowledgment had been made before any judge of a State court, or before two justices of the peace; as if such attorneys-in-fact or officer of a corporation had acknowledged the deed to be the deed of the grantor or of the corporation; as if such deeds had thereto annexed a certificate, in legal form, that the officer or officers taking the acknowledgment were really what they purport to be: Provided, That the certificate of acknowledgment by a femme covert shall show that the acknowledgment was made “apart” or “privily” from her husband, or use some other term importing that her acknowledgment was made out of his presence, and also that she acknowledged or declared that she willingly executed or that she willingly acknowledged the deed, or that the same was her voluntary act, or to that effect: And provided also, That when the power of attorney shall have [been] executed by a femme covert the same shall be effectual and sufficient if there shall have been such an acknowledgment of the same as would be sufficient, under the provisions of this act, to pass her estate and interest therein were she a party executing the deed of conveyance, the record and copy thereof of any deed recorded as aforesaid to be evidence thereof, in the same manner and to have the same effect as if such deed had been originally executed, acknowledged, and recorded according to law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all exceptions in favor of parties beyond the District of Columbia, which may by existing laws be relied or relied on in any action or proceeding brought in said District, are hereby repealed and abrogated: Provided, That this section shall not affect the right of parties in actions now pending, and such as may be brought within three years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the acts of Congress approved May thirty-first, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, and April twenty, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, in reference to the acknowledgment and recording of deeds of land situated in said District, shall be taken and construed as cumulative with the acts of Maryland on the same subject in force in said District at the passage thereof, and that an acknowledgment made and certified in compliance with any one of said acts, and before any officers authorized by either of said acts to take an acknowledgment, (whether in or out of the District of Columbia,) shall be good and effectual; and if it shall appear that the grantor “acknowledged said deed,” it shall have the same effect as if he or she acknowledged the deed to be his or her act and deed. And any acknowledgment made by a femme covert under either of said acts of Congress (which shall be sufficient under the provisions of this act) of any deed executed by her husband, and heretofore recorded in the District of Columbia, shall be good and effectual to bar all claim on her part to dower in the lands described therein, situated in said District, although she shall not have executed the same.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CXI.—An Act further to provide for the Verification of Invoices.

CHAP. CXV.—An Act for the Relief of the Occupants of the Lands of the Ex-Mission of San José, in the State of California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person who has the possession rightfully as against all others except the United States, or, being out of possession, is, as against all others except as aforesaid, entitled to the possession of any portion of the tract of land situate in the county of Alameda, State of California, known as the lands of the ex-mission of San José, as included in the map and survey thereof, made October, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, by E. H. Dyer, deputy United States surveyor, shall have the right, and the right is hereby granted to each and every such person, to enter and purchase of the United States, at the sum or price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, such portion of said tract so rightfully possessed by him, her, or them, or to which he, she, or they may so have such right of possession, whether such person claim the same by conveyance from or under Andres Pico and Juan B. Alvarado, or either of them, or by possession only: Provided, however, That any person entitled under this act to a parcel of less than eight acres shall in all such cases pay ten dollars for the same.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every person claiming any benefit under this act shall, within one year from the passage thereof, present to the register and receiver of the United States land office at San Francisco a survey or plat of the portion of said tract claimed by him, her, or them, and which shall exhibit the quarter section or sections, or parts thereof, included in said plat, made by or under the direction of the United States surveyor general for California, and therewith a written statement setting forth the right of such claimant to enter and purchase such portion under the provisions of this act, and whether the said claimant has acquired the alleged title of said Pico and Alvarado, or either of them thereto, or holds by possession only; and thereupon such register and receiver shall, under such rules as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, proceed and take, hear, and examine the evidence which may be offered in support of or against such claim, and, upon the proofs being closed, shall determine upon and decide the same: Provided, That no decision of said register and receiver shall be final until approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the claimant in whose favor final decision has been made, upon paying to the receiver of the land office at San Francisco for the land embraced in such final decision the sum therefor prescribed in the first section of this act, shall be entitled to a patent for such land from the United States, conveying all the interest of the United States therein to such claimant.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That upon all proceedings under this act being closed, and upon the appeal, taken to the Supreme Court of the United States by E. L. Beard and others, claimants of said lands against the United States, being dismissed, or the decree appealed from affirmed, the surveyor general of the United States for California shall cause the lines of the public surveys to be extended over all portions of said land which shall not have been disposed of under the provisions hereof, and thereafter the same shall be disposed of as in the case of other public lands.

CHAP. CXX.—An Act to incorporate the Continental Hotel Company of the City of Washington.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Lewis Delmonico, of New York city, B. B. French, Henry D. Cooke, John W. Forney, of Washington city, Stephen Flanagan, William Overfield, jr., J. Warren Brown, of Maine, Thornton Smith, George D. Kellogg, and George Plowman, of Philadelphia, and their associates, and all persons who now or hereafter may be holders of the stock hereinafter mentioned, shall be, and they are hereby, declared to be constituted a body politic or corporate by the style of the Continental Hotel Company, to have perpetual succession, to be capable in law of suing and being sued, to have a common seal, and to have, hold, receive, enjoy, and take, either by absolute conveyance in fee simple or upon ground rent, and in case of a conveyance upon ground rent with power to execute the necessary covenant for securing the payment thereof, such real estate as may be necessary or proper for the construction of a hotel in the city of Washington, with such supplementary buildings as may be adapted to and form part of the general plan and design thereof, with power to furnish and equip the same for the accommodation and use of any parties who may be desirous of renting and occupying the same, and the real estate, or any part thereof, when in the opinion of said corporation it may be proper to do so, to sell and to convey to any person or persons who may be desirous of purchasing the same the furniture and equipment thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said corporation shall not exceed two million dollars, divided into twenty thousand shares of one hundred dollars each, and that it shall be held as personal property, and may be transferred under such regulations as the corporators shall judge convenient.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That a general meeting of the corporators shall be annually held on the second Monday of January, for the election of five managers, and the transaction of other business; but if such meeting or election shall not then take place, the corporation shall not for that cause be dissolved, but such meeting or election shall take place as soon thereafter as may be, one week's public notice thereof being first given in at least two daily newspapers in the city of Washington.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the election of managers shall be by ballot from among the corporators, and that in the enactment of by-laws for the government of the corporation and its officers, and in the decision of all questions, whether of election of officers or disfranchisement of corporators, either because of their delinquency in paying for the amount of stock by them purchased of the corporation, or for other causes, and on all questions at the meetings of the corporation, the corporators present, either in person or by proxy, shall severally vote once for each share of stock held by them.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the managers shall continue in office until their successors are elected; they shall elect a president from among themselves, supply vacancies in their number, whether occasioned by death, resignation, or refusal to act, and shall have the general and entire control of the affairs and interests of the company, except so far as may be otherwise provided by the corporators. Three members shall be a quorum at these meetings.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That until other officers shall be duly elected, the persons named in the first section of this act shall be held to be managers of the said corporation, and shall have power and authority as such.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time hereafter alter, amend, or repeal this charter.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CXXI.—An Act providing for the Confinement of Juvenile Offenders against the Laws of the United States in Houses of Refuge.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States, being under the age of sixteen years, and who may hereafter be convicted of crime by any court of the United States, the punishment whereof shall be imprisonment, shall be confined during the term of sentence in some house of refuge to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be transported and delivered to the warden or keeper of such house of refuge by the marshal of the district where such shall have occurred; or if such conviction be had in the District of Columbia, then, and in such case, the transportation and delivery shall be by the warden of the jail of said District, and the reasonable actual expense of the transportation, necessary subsistence, and hire, and transportation of assistants and the marshal or warden, only, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior, out of the judiciary fund.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to contract with the managers or persons having control of such houses of refuge for the imprisonment, subsistence, and proper employment of all such juvenile offenders, and to give the several courts of the United States and of the District of Columbia notice of the places so provided for the confinement of said offenders; and such offenders shall be sentenced to confinement in the house of refuge nearest the place of conviction so designated by the Secretary of the Interior.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CXXII.—An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to provide for the better Organization of Indian Affairs in California."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of sixty thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to pay the settlers in Hoopa Valley, California, for their improvements on the Indian reservation therein: Provided, That before the same or any part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid, the said improvements shall be appraised by the superintendent of Indian affairs, the Indian agent at said reservation, and the surveyor general of California; and if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, their appraisal shall be reasonable, and shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum herein appropriated, the said Secretary is hereby authorized to apply the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in payment for the said improvements, taking the proper releases therefor: And provided further, That the moneys hereby appropriated be reimbursed from the proceeds of the sales of Indian reservations in said State under the provisions of the act to provide for the better organization of Indian affairs in California, approved April eight eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

and be entitled to use and exercise all the powers, rights, and privileges incident to such corporation, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining in said city of Washington building or buildings for a hotel, with rooms, shops, and offices, to be used therefor and therewith; and they may purchase and hold real and personal estate required and convenient therefor; and may, after construction thereof, sell, convey, or lease, and receive rent therefor, in whole or in part, as they may choose and find for the interest of said corporation.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said corporation shall not exceed the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, and that the stock shall be divided into shares of one thousand dollars each, and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the said corporation by its by-laws may direct.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the government and direction of the affairs of the corporation shall be invested in a board of directors, not less than five in number, who shall be elected by the stockholders at their annual meeting, which shall be held on the first Monday of May in each year, from among the corporators and their associates and successors, in such manner as the by-laws of said corporation may direct.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they may deem needful and proper for the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the corporation, not contrary to the charter or to the laws of the United States and the ordinances of the city of Washington, and shall have power to alter or amend the same, from time to time, as the interests of the corporation, in their opinion, may require.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That this act may be altered, amended, or repealed, at the pleasure of Congress.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

CHAP. CXXVI.—An Act supplemental to an Act entitled "An Act to amend the several Acts respecting Copyright," approved February third, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, and to the Acts in addition thereto and amendment thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of said act shall extend to and include photographs and the negatives thereof which shall hereafter be made, and shall inure to the benefit of the authors of the same in the same manner, and to the same extent, and upon the same conditions as to the authors of prints and engravings.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a printed copy of every book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, for which a copyright shall be secured under said acts, shall be transmitted free of postage or other expense by the author or proprietor thereof, within one month of the date of publication, to the Library of Congress at Washington for the use of said Library; and the Librarian of Congress is hereby required to give a receipt in writing for the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any proprietor of a book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, for which a copyright shall be secured as aforesaid, shall neglect to deliver the same pursuant to the requirement of this act, it shall be the duty of the Librarian of Congress to make demand thereof in writing, at any time within twelve months after the publication thereof; and in default of the delivery thereof within one month after the demand shall have been made, the right of exclusive publication secured to such proprietor under the acts of Congress respecting copyright shall be forfeited.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in the construction of this act the word "book" shall be construed to mean every volume and part of a volume, together with all maps, prints or other engravings belonging thereto; and shall include a copy of any second or subsequent edition which shall be published with any additions, whether the first edition of such book shall have been published before or after the passing of this act: Provided, however, That it shall not be requisite to deliver to the said Library any copy of the second or any subsequent edition of any book, unless the same shall contain additions as aforesaid, nor of any book which is not the subject of copyright.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, to provide for the usual distribution of medals among the chiefs of the Indian tribes, the sum of five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay in coin such of the annuities as by the terms of any treaty of the United States with any Indian tribe are required to be paid in coin.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That each of the chiefs, warriors, and heads of families of the Stockbridge Munsee tribes of Indians residing in the county of Shawana and State of Wisconsin, may, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, enter a homestead and become entitled to all the benefits of an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May twenty, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, free from any fee or charge whatever, and any part of the lands being a part of their present reservation, which may be abandoned under the foregoing provisions, may be sold under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds applied for the benefit of such Indians as may settle on said homesteads, to aid them in improving the same. The said homestead thus secured shall not be subject to any tax, levy, or sale whatever, nor shall the same be sold, conveyed, mortgaged, or in any manner incumbered except upon the decree of the district court of the United States, as hereinafter provided. Whenever any of said chiefs, warriors, or heads of families of said tribes, having filed with the clerk of the district court of the United States a declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to dissolve all relations with any Indian tribe, two years previous thereto, shall appear in said court, and prove to the satisfaction thereof, by the testimony of two citizens of the United States, that for five years last past he has adopted the habits of civilized life, that he has maintained himself and family by his own industry, that he reads and speaks the English language, that he is well disposed to become a peaceable and orderly citizen; and that he has sufficient capacity to manage his own affairs; the court may enter a decree admitting him to all the rights of a citizen of the United States, and thenceforth he shall be no longer held or treated as a member of any Indian tribe, but shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges, and be subject to all the duties and liabilities to taxation of other citizens of the United States. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive them of annuities to which they are or may be entitled.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend such part of the amount herein appropriated to carry into effect any treaty stipulation with any tribe or tribes of Indians, all or any portion of whom shall be in a state of actual hostility to the Government of the United States, including the Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, Wichitas, and other affiliated tribes, as well as the Cherokees, as may be found necessary to support such individual members of said tribes as have been driven from their homes or reduced to want on account of their friendship to the United States, and enable them to subsist until they can support themselves in their own country: Provided, That an account shall be kept of the sums so paid for the benefit of the said members of said tribes, which account shall be rendered to Congress, at the commencement of the next session thereof, and all the purchases of articles for the purposes above set forth, shall be made of the lowest responsible bidder after sufficient public notice by advertisement in appropriate newspapers: Provided, also, That the said Secretary shall not be required to accept any bid which is in his judgment unreasonable in its character: Provided further, That no part of said annuities shall be expended for Indians outside of the Indian Territory south of Kansas, except in providing for such individual Indians or families as are sick and unable to remove to that Territory, or such as may be driven out of that Territory by armed rebels, after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in lieu of the bonds for the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, appropriated for the use of the Choctaw Indians, by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-two," approved March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, to pay to the Secretary of the Interior two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the relief and support of individual members of Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Seminole, Wichita, and other affiliated tribes of Indians, who have been driven from their homes and reduced to want on account of their friendship to the Government, as contemplated by the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and sixty-three," approved July fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to furnish the so-called refugee Indians in the Indian Territory such temporary relief as may be absolutely necessary, including clothing and provisions during the residue of the fiscal year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, to be furnished out of any money appropriated for the commissary and quartermaster's department: Provided, That a detailed report shall be made to Congress, at its next session, of all expenditures made for their relief.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who may drive or remove, except as herein after provided, any cattle, horses, or other stock from the Indian Territory for the purposes of trade or commerce, shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the agent of each tribe of Indians, lawfully residing in the said Indian Territory, be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell for the benefit of said Indians any cattle, horses, or other live stock belonging to said Indians, and not required for their use and subsistence, under such regulations as shall be established by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That nothing in this and the preceding section shall interfere with the execution of any order lawfully issued by the Secretary of War, connected with the movement or subsistence of the troops of the United States.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

Steamer Kearsarge, in her Conflict with the Piratical Craft the "Alabama," in Compliance with the President's Recommendation to Congress of the fifth of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Captain John A. Winslow, of the United States Navy, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines of the United States steamer "Kearsarge," for the skill and gallantry exhibited by him and the officers and men under his command, in the brilliant action on the nineteenth of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, between that ship and the piratical craft "Alabama"—a vessel superior to his own in tonnage, in guns, and in the number of her crew.

APPROVED, December 20, 1864.

No. 4.—A Resolution tendering the Thanks of Congress to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, of the United States Navy, and to the Officers and Men who assisted him in his gallant and perilous Achievement in destroying the rebel Steamer "Albemarle," in Compliance with the President's Recommendation to Congress of the fifth of December, eighteen hundred [and] sixty-four.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Lieutenant William B. Cushing, of the United States Navy, and to the officers and men under his command, for the skill and gallantry exhibited by them in the destruction of the rebel iron-clad steamer "Albemarle," at Plymouth, North Carolina, on the night of the twenty-seventh of October, eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

APPROVED, December 20, 1864.

No. 5.—Joint Resolution tendering the Thanks of the People and of Congress to Major General William T. Sherman, and the Officers and Soldiers of his Command, for their gallant Conduct in their late brilliant Movement through Georgia.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of the people and of the Congress of the United States are due, and are hereby tendered to Major General William T. Sherman, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in their late campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and the triumphal march thence through Georgia to Savannah, terminating in the capture and occupation of that city; and that the President cause a copy of this joint resolution to be engrossed and forwarded to Major General Sherman.

APPROVED, January 10, 1865.

No. 6.—Joint Resolution providing for the Termination of the Reciprocity Treaty of fifth June, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, between the United States and Great Britain.

Whereas it is provided in the Reciprocity Treaty concluded at Washington, the fifth of

Laws of the United States.

38TH CONG....2D SESS.

June, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, between the United States, of the one part, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of the other part, that this treaty "shall remain in force for ten years from the date at which it may come into operation, and further until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same;" and whereas it appears, by a proclamation of the President of the United States, bearing date sixteenth March, eighteen hundred and fifty-five, that the treaty came into operation on that day; and whereas, further, it is no longer for the interests of the United States to continue the same in force: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notice be given of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty, according to the provision therein contained for the termination of the same; and the President of the United States is hereby charged with the communication of such notice to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

APPROVED, January 18, 1865.

No. 7.—A Resolution to Present the Thanks of Congress to Brevet Major General Alfred H. Terry, and the Officers and Men under his Command.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are hereby presented to Brevet Major General Alfred H. Terry, and to the officers and men under his command, for the unsurpassed gallantry and skill exhibited by them in the attack upon Fort Fisher, and the brilliant and decisive victory by which that important work has been captured from the rebel forces and placed in the possession and under the authority of the United States; and for their long and faithful services and unwavering devotion to the cause of the country, in the midst of the greatest difficulties and dangers.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to communicate this resolution to General Terry, and through him to the officers and soldiers under his command.

APPROVED, January 24, 1865.

No. 8.—A Resolution tendering the Thanks of Congress to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and to the Officers, Petty Officers, Seamen, and Marines under his Command, for their Gallantry and Good Conduct in the recent Capture of Fort Fisher.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are hereby presented to Rear Admiral David D. Porter, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for the unsurpassed gallantry and skill exhibited by them in the attacks upon Fort Fisher, and the brilliant and decisive victory by which that important work has been captured from the rebel forces and placed in the possession and under the authority of the United States; and for their long and faithful services and unwavering devotion to the cause of the country in the midst of the greatest difficulties and dangers.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate this resolution to Admiral Porter, and through him to the officers, seamen, and marines under his command.

APPROVED, January 24, 1865.

No. 9.—Joint Resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to give the necessary Notice stipulated pending the Intention of the United States to purchase the Building known as Merchants' Exchange, New York City, now used for Custom-House Purposes.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to give notice to the owners of the building in New York city known as the Merchants' Exchange, and occupied as a custom-house, of the intention of the United States to purchase the same, for the sum of one million dollars, in accordance with the terms stipulated in the existing lease of the property to the Government.

APPROVED, January 25, 1865.

No. 10.—Joint Resolution reserving Mineral Lands from the Operation of all Acts, passed at the First Session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, granting Lands, or extending the Time of former Grants.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no act passed at the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, granting lands to States or corporations, to aid in the construction of roads or for other purposes, or to extend the time of grants heretofore made, shall be so construed as to embrace mineral lands, which in all cases shall be, and are, reserved exclusively to the United States, unless otherwise specially provided in the act or acts making the grant.

APPROVED, January 30, 1865.

No. 11.—A Resolution submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a Proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XIII.

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SECTION 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

APPROVED, February 1, 1865.

No. 12.—Joint Resolution declaring certain States not entitled to Representation in the Electoral College.

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and were in such condition on the eighth day of November, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, that no valid election for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, according to the Constitution and laws thereof, was held therein on said day: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, for the term of office commencing on the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-five; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice President for said term of office.

APPROVED, February 8, 1865.

No. 13.—Joint Resolution to terminate the Treaty of eighteen hundred and seventeen, regulating the Naval Force on the Lakes.

Whereas the United States, of the one part, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of the other part, by a treaty bearing date April, eighteen hundred and seventeen, have regulated the naval force upon the lakes, and it was further provided that "if either party should hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice;" and whereas the peace of our frontier is now endangered by hostile expeditions against the commerce of the lakes, and by other acts of lawless persons, which the naval force of the two countries, allowed by the existing treaty, may be insufficient to prevent; and whereas, further, the President of the United States has proceeded to give the notice required for the termination of the treaty by a communication which took effect on the twenty-third November, eighteen hundred and sixty-four: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the notice given by the President of the United States to the Government of Great Britain and Ireland to terminate the treaty of eighteen hundred and seventeen, regulating the naval force upon the lakes, is hereby adopted and ratified as if the same had been authorized by Congress.

APPROVED, February 9, 1865.

No. 14.—Joint Resolution tendering the Thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and the Officers and Men under his Command.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are hereby tendered to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and to the officers and men under his command, for the gallantry, military skill, and courage displayed in the brilliant series of victories achieved by them in the valley of the Shenandoah, and especially for their services at Cedar Run, on the nineteenth day of October, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, which retrieved the fortunes of the day, and thus averted a great disaster.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to communicate this resolution to Major General Sheridan, and through him to the officers and soldiers under his command.

APPROVED, February 9, 1865.

No. 15.—A Resolution providing for the Compilation of a Congressional Directory at each Session.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congressional Directory be compiled under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, and published by the Superintendent of Public Printing—the first edition for each session to be ready for distribution within one week after the commencement thereof.

APPROVED, February 14, 1865.

No. 16.—A Resolution appointing General Richard Delafield to be a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Richard Delafield, resident of Washington city, be, and he hereby is, appointed a regent of the Smithsonian Institution, in the place of Joseph G. Totten, deceased.

APPROVED, February 14, 1865.

No. 17.—A Resolution to extend the Time for the Reversion to the United States of the Lands granted by Congress to aid in the Construction of a Railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the Completion of said Road.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the time specified in the fourth section of the act of Congress approved June three, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by said act to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road, be, and the same is hereby, extended for the term of five years.

APPROVED, February 17, 1865.

No. 18.—Joint Resolution to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the Title to certain Property in Carson City and State of Nevada, for the Purposes of a Branch Mint located in said Place.

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in order to carry into effect an act entitled "An act to establish a branch mint of the United States in the Territory of Nevada," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, has purchased of Moses Job and Margaret, his wife, and James L. Riddle, the preëmtors and occupants thereof, certain city or town lots in said Carson City, together with all the valuable improvements thereon; and whereas it is highly important for the interest of the Government to obtain, at an early day, the use and possession of said property, to establish and open said branch mint: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to receive and accept from said Moses Job and Margaret, his wife, and James L. Riddle, such relinquishments and conveyances of their right and claim to said lots and property as he, the said Secretary, shall deem sufficient for the extinguishment of any claim, right, or title which the said Moses Job and Margaret, his wife, and James L. Riddle may or can have thereto; and said lots and property shall thereafter be reserved from public sale, preëmption, or homestead settlement, and shall remain the property of the United States.

APPROVED, February 23, 1865.

No. 19.—Joint Resolution to facilitate the Adjustment of certain Accounts of the American Colonization Society for the Support of Recaptured Africans in Liberia.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia, under contracts made for that purpose under the authority of the act of Congress approved June sixteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty, on the principles of equity.

APPROVED, February 23, 1865.

No. 20.—Joint Resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American Registers to British Schooners "Minnie Williams" and "E. M. Baxter."

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue American registers to the British-built schooners "Minnie Williams" and "E. M. Baxter," said vessels being now owned by a citizen of Buffalo, New York.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

No. 23.—Joint Resolution in Relation to the Distribution of Books and Documents.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the undistributed portions of the books and documents heretofore printed or purchased for its use by order of either House of Congress, previous to the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and now deposited in the Interior Department and elsewhere, be distributed to members of the present Congress, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing; and said committee is hereby directed to divide the books in question into parcels equal in number to the whole number of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Territories, and as nearly equal in value and importance as possible, and to distribute them to the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, by such method as may be found most feasible and proper.

APPROVED, February 28, 1865.

No. 24.—Joint Resolution to provide for the Publication of a full Army Register.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be printed and published a full roster or roll of all general, field, line, and staff officers of volunteers who have been in the Army of the United States at any time since the beginning of the present rebellion, including all informal organizations which have been recognized or accepted and paid by the United States, showing whether they are yet in the service, or have been discharged therefrom, and giving casualties and other explanations proper for such Register. And, to defray in whole or in part the expenses of this publication, an edition of twenty-five thousand copies of such enlarged Register shall be published and may be sold to officers, soldiers, or citizens, at a price which shall not more than cover the actual cost of paper, printing, and binding, and shall not in any case exceed one dollar per volume.

APPROVED, March 2, 1865.

No. 25.—Joint Resolution authorizing a Contract with William H. Powell for a Picture for the Capitol.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Joint Committee on the Library be, and they are hereby, directed to enter into a contract with William H. Powell, of the State of Ohio, to paint a picture for the United States, to be placed at the head of one of the grand staircases in the Capitol, illustrative of some naval victory; the particular subject of the painting to be agreed on by the committee and the artist: Provided, That the entire expense of said picture shall not exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, and two thousand dollars shall be paid to said William H. Powell, in advance, to enable him to prepare for the work, the remainder of said installments at intervals of not less than one year, the last installment to be retained until the picture is completed and put up.

APPROVED March 2, 1865.

No. 27.—A Resolution to encourage the Employment of disabled and discharged Soldiers.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, should be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they shall be found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That, in grateful recognition of the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of persons honorably discharged from the military and naval service of the country, by reason of wounds, disease, or the expiration of terms of enlistment, it is respectfully recommended to bankers, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, farmers, and persons engaged in industrial pursuits, to give them the preference for appointments to remunerative situation[s] and employments.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

No. 28.—Joint Resolution of Thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the Army under his Command.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Major General George H. Thomas and the officers and soldiers under his command for their skill and dauntless courage, by which the rebel army under General Hood was signally defeated and driven from the State of Tennessee.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

No. 29.—A Resolution to encourage Enlistments and to promote the Efficiency of the Military Forces of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purpose of encouraging enlistments and promoting the efficiency of the military and naval forces of the United States, it is hereby enacted that the wife and children, if any he have, of any person that has been, or may be, mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be forever free, any law, usage, or custom whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding; and in determining who is or was the wife and who are the children of the enlisted person herein mentioned, evidence that he and the woman claimed to be his wife have cohabited together, or associated as husband and wife, and so continued to cohabit or associate at the time of the enlistment, or evidence that a form or ceremony of marriage, whether such marriage was or was not authorized or recognized by law, has been entered into or celebrated by them, and that the parties thereto thereafter lived together, or associated or cohabited as husband and wife, and so continued to live, cohabit, or associate at the time of the enlistment, shall be deemed sufficient proof of marriage for the purposes of this act, and the children born of any such marriage shall be deemed and taken to be the children embraced within the provisions of this act, whether such marriage shall or shall not have been dissolved at the time of such enlistment.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

No. 30.—A Resolution to authorize and direct an Inventory of Articles in the Quartermaster's Depots of the United States, and in the Possession of the Naval Storekeepers of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to cause a strict inspection to be made of the quartermaster's department, as soon as practicable after the passage of this resolution, and a comparison to be made between the reports of the officers in charge of the quartermaster's depots at New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and Louisville, and the articles on hand.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy, in like manner, be directed to cause an inventory to be made of all the property of the United States, in possession of the several naval storekeepers of the United States.

APPROVED, March 3, 1865.

No. 31.—A Resolution relating to International Exhibitions at Bergen, in Norway, and Oporto, in Portugal, during the Summer of eighteen hundred and sixty-five.

Whereas the Governments of the kingdom of Sweden and Norway, and of the kingdom of Portugal, have communicated to the Government of the United States the programmes of two international exhibitions to be held respectively at Bergen, in Norway, and at Oporto, in Portugal, during the summer of eighteen hundred and sixty-five: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby charged with the duty of making known to the people of the United States, by proclamation, or otherwise, as shall to him seem best, the facts in his possession relating to the international exhibitions proposed to be held at Bergen, Norway, and Oporto, Portugal, during the summer of eighteen hundred and sixty-five, and of inviting their participation therein: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred for any agency with regard to such exhibition; nor shall any claim of any agent of our Government be hereafter recognized.

No. 22.—A Resolution for the Relief of James B. Royce.

Whereas, James B. Royce, of the town of Shrewsbury and State of Vermont, entered the service of the United States as a private in company I, seventh regiment of Vermont volunteers, on the tenth day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and continued to serve in said company and regiment until the tenth day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, on which day, at Fort Barrancas, Florida, by the premature discharge of a cannon at which he was engaged in target practice, he received injuries which resulted in the loss of his left arm and left eye, by reason of which disabilities he was discharged from the service on the fourth of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, having served twenty-one months and twenty-two days; and whereas, by reason of not having been discharged for wounds actually received in battle, he is not entitled to the benefit of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property,' approved July twenty-two, eighteen hundred and sixty-one," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three; and whereas his case comes within the spirit and intent of said act: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said James B. Royce, of Shrewsbury, Vermont, be, and he is hereby, declared entitled to the benefit of said act, approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, the same as if he had been discharged from the service by reason of wounds received in battle, or had served out the full period of his enlistment.

APPROVED, February 25, 1865.

No. 26.—Joint Resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes two hundred and fifty thousand dollars additional out of the sum to be paid him under his Contract for building a Steam Screw Sloop-of-War.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Paul S. Forbes, of the city of New York, the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in addition to the sums heretofore paid, to apply on his contract of the date of May twenty-second, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, for building a steam screw sloop-of-war, the same being an advance payment on the contract, to aid in the completion of said sloopof-war: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be paid without the assent in writing of the sureties of said Paul S. Forbes: And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall be so construed as in any manner to affect or vary said contract, except as to the time of making said payment.

APPROVED, March 2, 1865.

No. 38.—A Resolution for the Relief of Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia.

Whereas Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia, by her courage and patriotic devotion in saving Colonel Streight and his party, and enabling them to make their escape from the hands of the rebels, has deserved well of the country,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to said Lucy A. Rice, her heirs or administrators, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.
